The Kansas City Chiefs return to Arrowhead Stadium for their second home contest of the season, facing the New York Jets on Sunday, Sept. 25. Kickoff is slated for 3:25 p.m. CT. The Chiefs enter the game with a 1-1 record after falling 19-12 to the Houston Texans last Sunday. The loss ended Kansas City's 11-game regular season winning streak dating back to October of 2015. In Week 1, Kansas City defeated the San Diego Chargers in overtime 33-27. Down 21 points in the third quarter, the Chiefs rallied for the greatest comeback victory in franchise history.

Chiefs Head Coach Andy Reid is in his fourth season with the club after recording 31 wins in his first three seasons, marking the highest combined win total of any head coach in franchise history in his first three years. Reid owns 11 postseason appearances in 17 seasons as a head coach.

In 2015, Reid's Chiefs rattled off 10 consecutive regular season wins to finish 11-5 and earn a playoff berth for the second time in his three seasons with the club. The Chiefs defeated the Houston Texans 30-0 in an AFC Wild Card Game in Houston, marking the team's first playoff win in 22 years. Reid and company advanced to the AFC Divisional Round. The club's 10 straight wins after starting just 1-5 marked the greatest turnaround in a single season in NFL history. The Chiefs had six players qualify for the 2016 Pro Bowl including linebackers Derrick Johnson, Tamba Hali and Justin Houston, safety Eric Berry, tight end Travis Kelce and cornerback Marcus Peters. Peters earned the NFL's Defensive Rookie of the Year award after tying for the league lead with eight interceptions in 2015. Berry earned the AP's Comeback Player of the Year award.

The Chiefs finished the regular season 5-1 in division play and 10-2 against AFC opponents. In the club's 10-game win streak to end the season, the team averaged 27.8 points per game and allowed a league best of only 12.8 points per game. KC outscored its opponents 278-128 in its last 10 games (+150 point differential). The Chiefs finished second in the NFL to Carolina (+20) in turnover differential with 29 takeaways and only 15 giveaways (+14). Kansas City's defense tied with Arizona for the league lead in scoring, with six returned touchdowns (four INTs, two fumbles). The club's special teams and defense were critical in average starting field position. The Chiefs led the league in that category, averaging the 31.3 yard line. KC's opponents averaged only the 24.6 yard line (third in the NFL). KC had 22 interceptions last season, the second-highest mark in the league behind the Panthers (24).

The team's 2016 schedule features five games against four playoff teams from the 2015 season, including the defending Super Bowl Champion Denver Broncos and the NFC Champion Carolina Panthers. The club's 2016 opponents boasted a combined record of 104-104 (.500) last season.

Next Sunday, Kansas City faces the Pittsburgh Steelers at Heinz Field on Sunday Night Football. Kickoff is slated for 7:30 p.m. CT.

CHIEFS HEAD COACH ANDY REID

Reid is currently in his 25th NFL season, 18th as a head coach and fourth with the Chiefs. In his first three seasons with the club he tallied 31 wins, more victories than any other head coach in franchise history in his first three years. Under Reid, the Chiefs have made the playoffs two of his three seasons and won its first playoff game since 1994 vs. the Texans in 2015. The team finished 11-5 after a 1-5 start. It was the greatest turnaround in a single-season in NFL history. In 2013, Reid led the Chiefs to an 11-5 record marking the greatest single-season turnaround in franchise history after the team finished 2-14 in 2012.

Reid boasts a career record of 162-111-1 (.593) in the regular season. He also owns a 11-11 postseason record. He ranks 13th in NFL history in regular-season winning percentage and is one of seven active NFL coaches with over 100 regular season wins. Prior to joining the Chiefs, Reid led the Philadelphia Eagles to a 130-93-1 (.583) regular season record during his 14 seasons as head coach. He led the Eagles franchise to one Super Bowl appearance. When you include his time as an NFL assistant coach, his teams have made the playoffs 17 times (20-16 record), and he has coached in three Super Bowls and eight NFC Championships.

Reid spent seven seasons as an assistant coach with the Green Bay Packers under Head Coach Mike Holmgren. Prior to joining the NFL ranks, Reid's final collegiate stop was the University of Missouri (1989-91). Prior to his stint with the Tigers, Reid spent two years working with the offensive line at the University of Texas – El Paso, and before that, he held the same position with Northern Arizona. In 1983, Reid took the position of offensive coordinator and offensive line coach at San Francisco State (1983-85). A tackle/guard at Brigham Young University from 1979-81, Reid entered the coaching ranks as a graduate assistant at BYU in 1982.

THE DOCTOR IS IN THE HOUSE

To some, playing in the National Football League is the second-most impressive accomplishment on Laurent Duvernay-Tardif's resume.

Duvernay-Tardif, a practicing medical student, was finishing his third year of med school at McGill University in Montreal at the time of the 2014 NFL Draft. With hopes of being selected on the second night, Duvernay-Tardif was unable to follow along live. Not that he didn't want to, he was just preoccupied in the ER assisting an emergency C-section for a premature newborn.

Though he wasn't selected on that second night, the Chiefs eventually used the 200th overall pick to acquire Duvernay-Tardif in the sixth round.

While spending much of his rookie season learning from the sidelines, Duvernay-Tardif appeared in 16 games while starting 13 in 2015. His off-seasons are spent back in Montreal at various hospitals on rotations, where patients have begun to recognize the Canadian standout.

While football remains his number one priority right now, Duvernay-Tardif plans to finish medical school within the next few offseasons and someday pursue his medical goals of specializing as an Emergency Room doctor.

AFTER 24 YEARS AWAY, HALI RETURNS HOME

Some may call it acting unreasonably, but Kansas City Chiefs linebacker Tamba Hali would disagree. He says he's just sporadic.

Hali proved just how sporadic he could be when the Chiefs gave him some time off from offseason rehab.

Rather than sitting at home, Hali used the time to take a four-day trip to his native country of Liberia, which, though peaceful now, is most often characterized by the civil war that took place there from 1989 to 2003 and saw the deaths of more than 250,000 people.

Hali escaped as an 8-year-old in 1992, and something recently came over him that made him feel like it was time to go back.

"Sometimes I just get up and do things," Hali explained in a press conference with the local Kansas City media. "[With the time off, I figured] maybe I'll go home for a few days and just see how the country is and be there (physically), just to see because I haven't been back. When I got there, I was able to do way more than I anticipated."

Hali visited with Liberia's current president, Madam Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, and saw family members he hadn't seen in two decades.

"It was almost restoring their faith because we haven't had any contact with one another," Hali said. "They tell other people, 'That's our nephew, that's our cousin.' And they say, 'If that's your cousin or nephew, how come you're living in this condition?'"

"People didn't believe them. Just to pop up on them the way that I did, they were rejoicing and thanking God. It was really pleasing."

Hali described several sights that especially stood out to him during his trip, the most of which strangely being the physical condition of the roads.

"Before, it was all dusty-type of roads," he explained. "Now we have real roads that can get you to places. Where I live is about three hours on the [new] real good road, but it would take you six hours before with the type of roads that we used to have."

Hali used the new roads to actually make the trip out to his childhood home, which, to his pleasant surprise, was still upright.

"With all the war and everything that's happened, it's still there," he said. "I remember where I used to take my bath on the side of the house and where I was at the time when the fighting started. It was reminiscing. It felt good, especially having the people related to me there also be able to remember what I remember."

"It's not like I'm making it up, so they remember what I remember. We're kind of reminiscing the entire time. It felt good. They're living, I'm living; it felt good."

Hali recalled the early 1990s when the war began and how he felt with all of the destruction around him.

"I always remember I always wanted to join the fighting," he said. "I wanted to do that because I was a child, and everyone was doing it."

Hali's brother wouldn't allow him to, and that, Hali believes, likely saved his life.

"I may be dead," he admits now. "I don't think I would be living. I don't really see how life would be if I would have stayed and fought because all the people I knew as friends, they're dead."

Upon escaping, Hali began living with his father in New Jersey at the age of 9 and later attended and played football at Teaneck High School. Hali first played football at Teaneck and there he developed into a legitimate college prospect. Hali was recruited to and later started at Penn State.

In 2006, Hali was drafted to the Chiefs in the first round, and the rest is history.

Now as he enters his 11th season in the league, life is much different than it was more than 20 years ago for the 32-year-old Hali.

His successful pro football career has given Hali the means to travel wherever he desires, and for him, a means to help make a difference in his native country.

"I want to bring awareness to the country," he said. "I don't formally have a foundation and everything I do as far as giving, I just do. I don't want to bring awareness to myself because of whatever reason, but with the country I'm from, there are needs."

"There are things that the country needs and I think people can help, but if people don't know, they just can't do it, so I think I could be a great ambassador for our country back there."

THE FIRST LADY OF FOOTBALL

Norma Hunt continues to play an integral part of the Chiefs in Kansas City. She owns the distinction of being the only woman known to have attended all 50 Super Bowls and was selected to preside over the coin toss at Super Bowl XLI along with Pro Football Hall of Fame quarterback Dan Marino. She is involved in numerous philanthropic and civic efforts in Kansas City and Texas. Her late husband, Lamar Hunt, was the guiding force behind the formation of the Kansas City Chiefs and the American Football League and was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1972. He, with the help of his family, coined the term "Super Bowl."

Hunt, along with her daughter-in-law Tavia Hunt (wife of current Chiefs Chairman & CEO Clark Hunt), participate in the NFL Women's Apparel advertising campaigns. The Hunts have been featured alongside other female NFL leaders such as Charlotte Jones Anderson (Dallas Cowboys Executive Vice President/Chief Brand Officer and NFL Foundation chair), Suzanne Johnson (wife of New York Jets owner Woody Johnson) and Tanya Snyder (wife of Washington Redskins owner Dan Snyder).

CHIEFS FANS SET WORLD RECORD

On Monday, Sept. 29, 2014, Kansas City defeated the New England Patriots 41-14, and Chiefs fans set a Guinness World Record for Loudest Crowd Roar at a Sports Stadium (Outdoors). Chiefs fans reached a peak decibel reading of 142.2 as Guinness World Records adjudicator Philip Robertson monitored the sound levels. The mark was set early in the contest while the club was on defense. The Arrowhead Stadium record passed the old record of 137.5 decibels and broke Seattle's record of 137.6.

THE ARROWHEAD ADVANTAGE

"The fans, they're phenomenal. 142.2 decibels, I never thought I would be fired up (for) decibel levels but I'm fired up for them. My ears are still ringing, I mean it was loud, loud down there. Like incredibly loud."

- Chiefs Head Coach Andy Reid

"I think these fans are special fans and they proved it tonight again. They're the best in the country. This doesn't happen anywhere else like this and I think they're feeding off, the whole town is feeding off it a little bit."

- QB Alex Smith

"It's a great feeling (playing at Arrowhead). On 3rd-and-long when you hear the crowd and you see the opposing quarterback yelling, trying to change the play and struggling to communicate with the offensive linemen. That's a great feeling because you know your percentage of getting a sack just went up. I love playing in front of our fans."

- LB Justin Houston

CHIEFS HONOR FIRST RESPONDERS

The Kansas City Chiefs home opener marked the 15th anniversary since the terrorist attacks that stunned the nation on September 11, 2001.

With that in mind, the Chiefs welcomed local firefighters, police officers and EMT's to honor and express gratitude for their protection of the greater Kansas City area.

Police Chief Doug Schroeder of Hesston, Kansas, led the team out of the tunnel carrying the American flag.

Chief Schroeder is responsible for taking down an active shooter in a workplace and saving multiple lives in February.

Following the team's entrance, 150 service members unfurled a field-sized American flag while country music singer Trace Adkins sang the national anthem.

During the first quarter, the families of Detective Brad Lancaster and Captain Dave Melton were honored. The two KCPD officers were shot in the line of duty earlier in the year.

At halftime, retired Navy Petty Officer First Class Generald Wilson performed, "God Bless America" as a tribute to 9/11 followed by a skydiving exhibition featuring the United States Navy Parachute Team, "The Leap Frogs."

CHIEFS OBS VISIT LOCAL KCFD STATION

The Kansas City Chiefs quarterback unit made an intimate visit to a local Kansas City fire station Monday in Westport to recognize firefighters and EMTs who serve in the Kansas City area.

"[We're thankful for] the chance to come out here and tell these guys how much we appreciate them, and the sacrifices they make on a daily basis for all of us," quarterback Alex Smith said. "It doesn't get said enough."

Following a meet and greet with the KCFD staff, a tour of the station and a quick fire truck ride-along around the city, the quarterbacks got the chance to swap helmets and suit up for gear demonstrations in an unwieldy and heftier uniform than usual.

"Just getting to interact and see what they go through on a day-to-day basis, and really, they do so much for us—protecting and just being such great people in our community," quarterback Nick Foles said. "Being here and just putting on the gear, going around in the fire truck and just seeing how they live life day to day is pretty neat for us."

"[We're] learning a little bit and goofing around a little bit too," Smith said. "It's fun to find out what these guys go through and some of the equipment they deal with here. We're talking real, real pressure situations here that these guys are under. We're in high pressure situations too, but this is on a different level. So it's fun to see what these guys have to deal with."

Sharon Martin, a KCFD Fire Apparatus Operator of over 21 years, saw this visit as a special memory, and she plans to retire her signed autographed helmet as a way to pay homage to the Chiefs and their efforts.

"The Chiefs are really big in community, and it really demonstrates that on their day off that they came out here," Martin said. "They could have been resting after their big game this week, but they took time out to come and visit us and that's huge."

Martin, along with the members of the Kansas City Fire Department, were presented with a personalized Chiefs KCFD Station 19 jersey in thanks for their continued service in the Kansas City community.

How the Chiefs became 'the team that people don't want to play'

Sam Mellinger
Kansas City Star
January 2, 2016

Albert Lewis is a fan, even now, 17 years after his last NFL game, and of course he follows the Chiefs closely because how could he not? He played most of his 16 seasons and 225 games in a red helmet with an arrowhead on the sides. His name is spelled in bold black letters inside Arrowhead Stadium, forever a member of the Chiefs' ring of honor.

Football is a business, he likes to say, so he does not come to this as a blind fan but there is a little more pride in his voice when he talks about his favorite former employer. Especially now, nine wins deep into a franchise-changing win streak. He says it's largely the same feeling whether you're a fan, player, former player or, it seems, a former player who now coaches for perhaps the game's top Super Bowl contender.

Like, Kevin Ross, who shared a defensive backfield with Lewis in Kansas City and now coaches cornerbacks for the Cardinals.

"We had a conversation about this the other day," Lewis said. "He said, 'Man, the team that people don't want to play is the Chiefs.'"

A caveat: nothing in American sports promotes overreaction like football, and especially in the NFL, games are won and seasons are lost on a razor's edge. The conversation around the Chiefs would be different if, for instance, Danny Woodhead caught that final pass at Arrowhead or if the Browns had completed that comeback instead of going all Browns.

But results matter, and by now the Chiefs have a tall enough stack of irrefutable results that they have not only changed their season and perhaps the futures of some coaches, but they've changed the look, feel and even the odds of the AFC playoffs.

Because a conspiracy of favorable external context (top teams appearing vulnerable) and internal fortitude (one of the greatest in-season turnarounds in NFL history) has reshaped the way the AFC will be decided.

Going into week 7, the Chiefs were a 300:1 longshot to win the Super Bowl, according to Bovada. Only the Ravens, Bears, Browns and Jaguars had worse odds. Now, the Chiefs are a 14:1 bet. Only the Patriots and Broncos have better odds among AFC teams. Football Outsiders' leading metric has the Chiefs as second in overall team efficiency, and first among AFC teams.

This is more than a market correction. The closer you look at both the Chiefs and the teams they'll compete against, the better you feel about their chances to win a playoff game for the first time in 22 years, and possibly more.

Some of this is the simple logic that most of the reasons to doubt the Chiefs are buried under more than two months of nothing but success. They are giving up 13.2 points per game since week 5. Since the turn of the century, only five teams have been more effective defensively. Two of them made their conference championship games. A third was the 2000 Ravens, the Super Bowl champions and one of the best defenses of all time.

Quoting statistics like this can be notoriously misleading, and in this particular case the stretch used coincides with a severe drop-off in competition. So dismiss if you'd like.

But it also lines up with the Chiefs becoming more of what they now are. They played the first three games without top cornerback Sean Smith (who is allowing only 51.4 percent of his targets to be completed, according to Pro Football Focus). Dontari Poe, recovering from back surgery, went from playing less than 60 percent of the total snaps the first three weeks to about 80 percent in the 12 games since.

Similarly, Eric Berry (Hodgkin lymphoma) and Derrick Johnson (ruptured Achilles) have played faster and stronger as the season has progressed, and Marcus Peters has gone from good to great in the second half.

What's more, the Chiefs have played much of the last two months without Justin Houston (their best overall player) and Husain Abdullah (severely underrated and under appreciated). They played last week without Houston and Tamba Hali. All three players should be back for the playoffs.

The NFL has long marketed and valued offense over defense, but half of the last 10 Super Bowl teams have ranked either first or second in points allowed. Only three have ranked in the top five in points scored. Even with that rotten start, and basically five straight games without Houston, the Chiefs rank second in points allowed.

What's more, the Chiefs have scored six touchdowns on defense, meaning the opposition is averaging just 15.2 net points per game with its offense on the field. No team in the league has been better and, again, that includes the Chiefs' terrible first month.

The Chiefs' offense is not as good as the defense, but its also much better than most casual fans probably realize. They are ninth in the league in points, and tied for ninth in yards per play, seventh in percentage of drives ending in points, and first in fewest turnovers.

Their offense is likely better than the tropes about Alex Smith's arm and Andy Reid's clock management allow, too.

In particular with Smith, the common criticisms and institutionalized doubts are both mostly earned but also a bad fit for how he has performed since October.

Smith has played three playoff games in his career. He beat Drew Brees in a shootout, was kneecapped by special teams mistakes in a loss to a defense that beat Aaron Rodgers and Tom Brady and won the Super Bowl, and threw for 378 yards and four touchdowns in a loss in which he played without Jamaal Charles and a starting receiver and still scored 44 points.

By virtually any measure, Smith is playing better than ever. He already has set career highs in yards, advanced metrics like Total Quarterback Rating have him on a career-best path, and studies of his play show more comfort and willingness to throw deep. In addition to all of that, he is one of the game's best running quarterbacks. His 437 yards rank fourth, and his 5.8 yards per rush average is higher than Cam Newton, Russell Wilson and Tyrod Taylor. Thirty-two of his 76 rushes have resulted in first downs or touchdowns, including 17 of 26 on third or fourth down.

Here's a sentence you didn't expect to be true: with the Steelers a relative longshot to make the playoffs, Alex Smith could be the best quarterback in the AFC postseason after Tom Brady.

This is not hyperbole.

His health, career postseason record and recent performance are all better than Andy Dalton. Denver's quarterback situation is a weekly soap opera, and Houston's is as bad as any playoff team in recent history. Ryan Fitzpatrick is having a very good season, and the Jets' receivers are better than the Chiefs', but he is also Ryan Fitzpatrick.

Wider comparisons of the Chiefs and their postseason competition are similar, and without the stink of their franchise's sorry playoff record, the reasons that Ross and others around the league see the Chiefs as so dangerous would be easier to see.

There are no perfect teams. The Patriots have Bill Belichick, Tom Brady and Rob Gronkowski but little else. They've suffered an astounding number of injuries, and gave up 65 points in consecutive losses to Denver and Philadelphia.

The Bengals have lost four of their last seven, beating only the Rams, Browns and 49ers, and will be playing with either A.J. McCarron or a diminished Andy Dalton, and have their own recent playoff failures. The Jets are probably undervalued by many, winning five in a row, but remain statistically unimposing, particularly on offense. The Steelers were just blown out by the awful Ravens, and the Texans are a product of the loophole that puts all division winners, no matter how mediocre, into the postseason.

So, strange as it may sound, the Chiefs have a real shot at this.

You know, it's not just former stars like Ross and Lewis who are high on the current group. Nick Lowery, the former kicker who is also in the team's ring of honor, spent much of a wide-ranging 30-minute conversation on a sort of magic he sees in this team.

Like many with ties to Kansas City, Lowery became enthralled with the Royals these last two years. The comebacks, the camaraderie, the relentlessness. It is almost certainly a coincidence of geography, but he sees a lot of similarities with the football team.

"They are playing almost like the Royals brand of football," Lowery said. "No major stars. They have no stars, but lots of heroes. Guys who understand what it takes to win, don't seem to care who gets the credit, and seem completely bought in on the bigger cause. That is the juice in the bottle that is the most elusive of all."

Lowery knows much of the Chiefs' postseason heartbreak in an undeniably personal way. As much as any fan, he has reason to be cynical. But as much as any football man, he also sees reason to be confident.

That's the inner conflict that will be determined by the rest of this Chiefs season, first on Sunday against the Raiders, and then, somehow, the next week in the playoffs.

American Cancer Society Awards Chiefs for Community Efforts throughout Kansas City

ACS recognized Chiefs for their efforts of helping save lives from breast cancer

For the seventh consecutive year, the American Cancer Society and the NFL have been committed to saving lives from breast cancer with “A Crucial Catch” campaign.

The Kansas City Chiefs were recognized on behalf of the American Cancer Society for their efforts in breast cancer awareness throughout the Kansas City community.

Programs including “A Crucial Catch and Look and Feel Better,” which teaches patients how to take care for themselves mentally and physically while undergoing treatment, are just a few of the initiatives the Chiefs and ACS support.

For the past three years, the Chiefs and ACS have awarded CHANGE grants for local clinics both to encourage and increase access to cancer screenings within the Kansas City area.

CHANGE grants are given to local clinics throughout the nation to educate and reach underserved women with breast cancer screenings at low to no cost.

As a result of these grants, hundreds of Kansas City women who otherwise may be incapable of receiving proper care have received health screenings.

Last year, ACS hosted breast cancer screenings for Kansas City residents at Arrowhead, detecting three unforeseen cancer diagnoses.

Receiving the award on the Chiefs behalf, the Chiefs director of community outreach, Chuck Castellano, helped pioneer programs to help raise awareness of breast cancer in the area.

“I think the most powerful number is the smallest number, and that’s three individuals that otherwise wouldn’t have known they have cancer, that we were able to help diagnose and get them support that they need,” Castellano said. “We really appreciate our budding partnerships, with American Cancer Society especially.”

The Chiefs and the NFL are committed to saving lives from breast cancer and addressing the burden of cancer in underserved communities.

Former high school football player James McGinnis realizes dream of meeting Chiefs

RUTH BAUM BIGUS
Kansas City Star
August 3, 2016

Attending a training camp practice is a big deal for most Chiefs fans. But the visit to Missouri Western State University proved extra special for one young man this week.

Former Olathe East High School football player James McGinnis made the journey to St. Joseph with his parents, Patrick and Susan, almost two years after suffering a traumatic brain injury in a game against rival Olathe South.

Now 20, James and his folks waited along the helmet walk to meet offensive lineman Mitch Morse. After a big bear hug from Morse, the two walked up the hill toward the Chiefs' locker room. Morse provided a little support for James, who still struggles with balance issues.

"I really appreciate how great you and all the Chiefs have been," James told Morse.

"The thing is, we're only as good as the people who support us, so we really appreciate all of you who support us," said Morse, who led James to a bench where they could sit and chat.

Morse then made a point of introducing James to other players as they walked to the locker room. With big smiles on their faces, Chiefs players bantered and posed for photos with James and his parents and autographed a football they brought to camp.

James showed the players the "I love you" symbol in American sign language — a gesture that he and his family had shared before his injury, and the first movement James demonstrated as he was coming out of a coma after his injury. The McGinnises also shared decals of the symbol with the players.

James said the best part of his visit was getting to meet running back Knile Davis, one of his favorite Chiefs players who played at Arkansas before turning pro. After a big hug, Davis and James compared tattoos.

"Since me and my parents have been Arkansas Razorback lovers, I loved the chance to meet and tease Knile," James said. "I liked getting to call him The A-Knile-ator —the other players told me that was his nickname."

Without knowing it, Davis played a big role in keeping James motivated as he healed from his injury.

“When he was going through recovery, James would get so excited to see Knile play, especially against Houston when he took the kickoff return for a touchdown,” Patrick McGinnis said.

James showed Davis how to make the “I love you” symbol with his hand.

“He told me when he makes a big play this season he’s going to do the ‘I love you sign,’ ” said James, a big smile creasing his face.

Former Chiefs linebacker Shawn Barber played host to the McGinnis family. James and Barber served as honorees in May for the 29th Annual Amy Thompson Run benefitting the Brain Injury Association of Kansas and Greater Kansas City.

James has also kept busy taking a few college classes at Johnson County Community College.

“The most elusive thing is his balance,” his father said. “This summer we have been working to focus on that. ... He can see 20/20, but when an object is moving it will come in and out of focus, and that affects his balance. We’re working with doctors to pinpoint the problem.”

James does physical therapy and cross-fit training twice a week, aqua therapy weekly and he is beginning to lift weights again.

“He started in May lifting a PVC pipe ... and now he is up to 80 pounds and lifting it up over his head and on his own,” Patrick McGinnis said.

Despite his injury, James’ passion for football has never waned. That was clear as he chatted with the Chiefs players this week.

There was an occasional joke, and James demonstrated his version of the popular game Pokémon Go by poking running back Charcandrick West in the side.

“This was incredible,” James said. “I loved the whole thing. They were all humble and kind.”

Chiefs look to add St. Louis to fanbase

Jim Thomas
St. Louis Dispatch-Post
August 21, 2016

ST. JOSEPH, MO. • Even before the NFL relocation vote sent Stan Kroenke's Rams off to Los Angeles, Kansas City Chiefs officials were talking about possibilities in the St. Louis market.

"The what-if scenarios, and making sure that we were positioned correctly," Chiefs president Mark Donovan said. "The one thing that kept resonating in all our conversations prior to (the vote) was, let's do this the right way.

"Let's be respectful. Let's make sure we take a good pulse of the market before we do anything. And I think we did that."

When the relocation vote came down Jan. 12, Donovan said the Chiefs received calls almost immediately from disenfranchised St. Louis Rams season-ticket holders inquiring about buying Chiefs tickets.

"We knew that was gonna happen," Donovan said. "We know just from our research that there's a base of Chiefs fans out there. Now they have a way to activate that.

"And then not too shortly following that, we got a lot of calls from corporations in St. Louis, just saying: 'We don't know what we're doing yet, but we'd like to know what you're doing.'

"So we took those calls and listened. We had a lot of good conversation. And to be honest we sort of said, 'Let's wait and see for both sides if this makes sense.' Our belief is, just from the research we see, that it's a market that will have NFL affinity."

Regardless of the sport, many fans like to have a team to root for, or adopt. When it comes to the NFL in St. Louis, some may stick with the Rams. Some may be done with the NFL altogether. Some may align themselves with neighboring teams such as the Chicago Bears, Indianapolis Colts, or Tennessee Titans. Or with teams that have more of a national brand, such as Green Bay.

But as of Jan. 12, the state of Missouri had only one NFL franchise within its borders: the Chiefs of Kansas City. The Chiefs refer to their fan base as Chiefs Kingdom. As much as possible, they'd like to add St. Louis to their realm.

"Clearly, it's an opportunity," Donovan said.

And clearly, this is a good time to be a Chiefs fan. Under coach Andy Reid, a former University of Missouri assistant, the Chiefs closed the 2015 regular season with 10 consecutive victories, and then posted their first postseason victory in 22 years. They are considered among the top Super Bowl contenders in the AFC this season.

"If you look at the history of the league and how teams became popular across the country, you've got to be successful with your product," Donovan said. "So we think we're hitting this at a pretty good point. We think we've got a pretty good football team. It's a great time to be out there as an option for those (St. Louis) fans."

The first step for the Chiefs in St. Louis is televising their preseason games on KMOV (Channel 4) and having KMOX (1120 AM) join their radio network for many regular-season games. In the case of conflicts with Cardinals baseball — and there are several — the radio broadcasts will switch to 98.1 HD3. That's where KC's exhibition games are being carried, too. The Chiefs also have discussed a wide range of other possibilities, from broadcasting auxiliary programming such as a coach's show, to making an offseason "caravan" stop in St. Louis, to even playing a preseason game there.

Speaking of the preseason game possibility, Donovan said: "It's definitely something that's been discussed as the outer fringe of the ideas. With everything going on in preseason there are a lot of variables that play into that. So we want to see how that plays out from the league perspective — how many games we have."

There has been talk in recent years, although not so much lately, about shortening the preseason and adding extra games to the regular-season schedule.

Possibilities exist with respect to training camp activities as well. For example, say the Chiefs wanted to hold a couple of days of joint practices with the Bears, Colts, or Titans during training camp. Maybe it would make sense to split the distance and hold those workouts in St. Louis.

"As you've seen around the league, more and more of these training camps have either dual team practices or scrimmages or stadium events," Donovan said. "We're looking at all those, whether it's in St. Louis or Arrowhead or here (Missouri Western State University)."

Less on the "outer fringe" is the concept of the offseason caravan, in which team officials and players travel to various cities and towns in the region to meet and greet fans.

The Rams never felt the need to do a caravan in their 21 seasons in St. Louis. Conversely, the baseball Cardinals have done it for years. The Chiefs have an offseason caravan program, and it could be coming to St. Louis.

"In the past, we've been very respectful of the rules, and not infringing on the Rams," Donovan said. "So that is something we'll look at in the future. Maybe next year. Maybe the following year.

"And then when you go down that path, it's everything. We do school visits. We do military visits. We do radio shows. We do TV shows. All those things are in consideration, but they've gotta make sense.

"They've gotta make sense for us, they've gotta make sense for the market. ... But we think they're all on the table to be discussed at the appropriate time."

An overriding factor in all such considerations, Donovan said, is whether they help the football team become more successful.

“But I think as we go on here, things may evolve,” he added.

The Bears also have established a footprint in the market, televising their preseason games on KTVI (Channel 2). The league has allowed both teams to televise their preseason games in the Gateway City this year on what it says is a test basis.

But over the long term, being a home-state team favors the Chiefs in the league’s eyes.

“It gets a little complicated with league rules, but that does give us a bit of an advantage from a corporate partnership standpoint, and from the trademark/marketing rights,” Donovan said.

“Every team that operates in a state, they get exclusive rights to that state’s borders.”

That is, absent another team in that state.

“When the Rams were there, they got a 75-mile radius we couldn’t touch because that was their market.” Donovan said. “And we had a 75-mile radius around Kansas City that the Rams couldn’t touch. Now (without the Rams) that opens that up for us from a marketing standpoint.”

Prior to the full relocation vote, the NFL’s stadium committee voted 5-1 in favor of the Carson stadium plan proposed in tandem by the Chargers and Raiders. A pro-Carson plan was in essence a vote for keeping the Rams in St. Louis.

Chiefs owner Clark Hunt raised some eyebrows in St. Louis by casting the sole dissenting vote on the stadium committee. But Donovan indicated it was a vote against having two teams immediately in the Los Angeles market rather than any opposition to keeping the Rams in St. Louis.

“Clark has been on record saying that he believes that relocation should be the last resort, and that teams should stay in the markets they’re in,” Donovan said. “When you look at what played out with all the options — having two teams in LA versus one team — I think he’s a believer, and has been, that we should make one team work very well, and let’s see how that goes.”

Clark and Tavia Hunt Serve As Honorary Chairs for 2016 JDRF Dream Gala

Pete Sweeney

Kansas City Chiefs Chairman and CEO Clark Hunt and his wife, Tavia, served as honorary chairs for the JDRF Dream Gala this past Saturday night. The event, which features silent and live auctions, is designed to raise funds for Type 1 diabetes (T1D) research.

"Tavia and I are honored to be this year's Dream Gala honorary chairs," Clark said at the event. "For 40 years, JDRF has been the leading funder of Type 1 diabetes research in the world, and we are proud to do our part to help find a cure."

Type 1 diabetes is an autoimmune disease that strikes both children and adults suddenly and without having anything to do with diet or lifestyle. JDRF's function is to raise funds for research and ultimately find a cure for the disease.

"Clark and I are the parents to three children, and we know the worries, concerns and scares that every parent deals with when raising children," Tavia said. "However, we have never known firsthand the additional challenges that many of you and other parents of children with Type 1 diabetes deal with. Throughout this year, we've had the opportunity to hear your stories, to meet with JDRF leaders and to learn about the advancements and breakthroughs that are being made, but the challenges still remain.

"Our family and the Kansas City Chiefs organization have had a long, outstanding relationship with JDRF."

In the past year, the Kansas City chapter of JDRF hosted the JDRF One Walk and the TypeOneNation national summit, had 37 riders take part in the JDRF Ride to Cure and had two representatives participate in the JDRF Children's Congress.

The 2015 Dream Gala, which raised $2 million for T1D research, was named the number one nationally sponsored event in Kansas City for the eighth year in a row.

Between both the auctions and straight donations, the guests in attendance at the 2016 Dream Gala raised $1.87 million for research throughout the evening.

Chiefs President Mark Donovan Shares Plans for St. Louis Market

BJ Kissel
Chiefs.com
June 20, 2016

Chiefs president Mark Donovan was recently asked about the efforts to bring Chiefs Kingdom to St. Louis

The plan was to be patient and respectful to a community that had just lost a big piece of its identity.

With the Rams franchise moving from St. Louis to Los Angeles this past offseason, there was a natural connection between the reach of Chiefs Kingdom and the proximity to the St. Louis market.

On Friday, Kansas City Chiefs president Mark Donovan was asked about the plans to bring the Chiefs brand into a market that sits just a few hours down I-70.

“The day they announced that the Rams were leaving St. Louis, we got a handful of phone calls from people wanting to buy season tickets from St. Louis,” Donovan explained. “Then the day after they moved, we got a handful of phone calls from corporations in St. Louis saying, ‘We want to be partners with the Chiefs. Let’s talk about activation programs.’”

“What we knew and respected was the process that town was going through,” Donovan added. “What their fans went through was tough—painful. When you move a football franchise, that’s ripping a big part of the town out of that town.”

“We said publicly (at the time) that we’re going to be respectful, we’re going to be patient, and that we are going to enter the St. Louis market, but we’re going to do it at the right time.”

That plan was fast-tracked last week after the league sent a memo out to every owner, president and CEO in the NFL.

“The memo said that because the Rams are playing in Los Angeles, St. Louis is now an open television market,” Donovan explained. “For preseason television, we basically put our own networks together. So a couple of teams, including us, have lobbied the league and said we’re going to put our preseason games in St. Louis because it makes sense. We have fans there and we’re going to get in front of them now and develop that relationship.”

“The league has decided that they’re going to allow any team in the NFL that can put together an adjacent network, which is really confusing and very complicated, but basically means that if you can make a chain link of networks—broadcast partners, to get you to St. Louis, then you can broadcast your games there.”

“We knew that was coming and we have been working on this for the past few months. (Vice president of business development) Tyler Epp and his team have already negotiated deals, so our preseason games will be broadcasted in St. Louis. The plan is to have our shoulder programming, which is all the programming you see on our network, in St. Louis this season as well.”

For Donovan and the Chiefs, this is just the first step.

“We’ll be in there with a product,” he explained of the television programming. “Then we’ll continue to build relationships in the community.”

The Chiefs have already heard from military bases and schools in the area about wanting to do events with them.

“I think what you’re going to see over the next four or five years is a real resurgence of the Chiefs brand in St. Louis,” Donovan said. “We do have some advantages over the other NFL franchises, not only in geography, but because it’s in the state of Missouri, we’re the only team that can actually market our corporate partnerships as well as our brand in St. Louis, so that’s a big advantage.

“Again, we’ll do it respectfully, we’ll do it patiently and we’ll do it strategically.”

Chiefs announce Brad Childress, Matt Nagy will be co-offensive coordinators

Terez Paylor
Kansas City Star
January 21, 2016

The Chiefs have officially settled on their new offensive coordinators, as the team announced Thursday that Brad Childress and Matt Nagy will split the duties.

Childress, 59, has served the last three years as the Chiefs' spread-game analyst and special-projects coach, while Nagy, 37, has been the quarterbacks coach. Both will team up to replace Doug Pederson, who became the Philadelphia Eagles' head coach Monday.

"I'm fired up about the opportunity to have both these guys in that position and maintaining continuity and stability within the offense," Chiefs coach Andy Reid said.

Reid said he will call the plays, though Nagy and Childress will have input. Childress will remain in the coaching box while Nagy will move to the sideline and be the voice in the quarterback's headset.

Both will contribute to the gameplan each week, though Reid will continue to run the daily meetings where plays are installed, as he's done the last three years in Kansas City.

"He enjoys doing that, he enjoys presenting in front of the team," Childress said.

Childress was Reid's offensive coordinator in Philadelphia during 2002-05, with the team ranking an average of 11th in the league in total offense. Childress said Reid called most of the plays then.

"There were times, obviously, where he said 'Hey Brad, put a series together,' and I'd do it," Childress said. "But he loves to do that. That's one of his passions, that's one of his joys, and I know that's what he's enjoying about doing it the way he's doing it here."

Childress used his time under Reid as a platform to become a head coach in 2006, and he led the Minnesota Vikings to a 39-35 record before he was dismissed midway through the 2010 season. After sitting out 2011, Childress was hired as the Cleveland Browns' offensive coordinator under Pat Shurmur, who was fired after the 2012 season.

In 2013, Childress joined Reid's staff in a role in which he analyzed league-wide trends, among other duties.

Nagy, like Pederson, is a former quarterback. Nagy played in college at Delaware and spent six years in the Arena Football League. He spent a part of 2008 as a coaching intern on Reid's staff in Philadelphia, thanks to recommendation from current Chiefs co-director of player personnel Brett Veach, his former teammate at Delaware who was a coaches assistant with the Eagles at the time.

"He just thought it would be a good opportunity for me to experience the NFL level as a coach," Nagy said, "and it just kind of went from there."

When the Arena League briefly folded in 2009, Nagy was selling houses when he asked to come back and do a second internship. He eventually joined the Eagles' staff in 2010 as a coaches assistant and was promoted to quality control coach in 2011.

Nagy followed Reid to Kansas City in 2013 and has served as his quarterbacks coach since, helping the Chiefs' signal-callers learn the offense.

"You need to be able to take that play that they're installing, and you become a teacher in your classroom," Nagy said, describing his role as quarterbacks coach. "So when we're in here, I need to be my best at giving them another set of eyes to see the field, another perspective. I was fortunate enough to play the quarterback position all my life, so I have the ability to know certain situations that they're in (and) what you see is a little bit different from what you get in the bird's eye view in the box."

Since joining the Chiefs in 2013, quarterback Alex Smith completed 63.7 percent of his passes for 10,064 yards, with 61 touchdowns and 20 interceptions. The Chiefs compiled a 31-17 regular-season record during that time.

"Matt's got a nice feel for the game," Reid said. "Some guys have a knack for it, and he's one of those guys. And I've noticed with his participation that he's got a pretty good grasp of the offenses and defenses in this league."

Reid said the individual duties for Nagy and Childress haven't exactly been divvied up yet, but "there's plenty to work with there."

Neither new co-coordinator seemed concerned about the split.

"We think alike, we work well together — we've done it the last three years," Nagy said. "And once Coach came to us and talked to us about this, it was really exciting."

“It’s not like it’s a three-man, everybody-speak-into-the-microphone-at-one (deal) when a play comes up,” Childress said. “All that stuff kind of gets worked out beforehand ... we’re gonna spend enough time together we’re probably gonna be able to finish each other’s sentences.”

There is one way, however, that the duties have been defined, as Nagy will assume Pederson’s as the sole voice in Smith’s headset.

“I’ve been able to witness that and be able to learn from Doug and see how he does it, so I think the transition is going to be really smooth,” Nagy said. “Being in here with Alex and the rest of the quarterbacks for three years is a huge advantage.”

Nagy, however, noted that replacing everything Pederson did won’t be easy — even for two men.

“He’s really a good people (person) — he’s got a great relationship with all the players, everyone really got along really well with him,” Nagy said. “Being a former player in this league is very advantageous, so a guy like Alex Smith and Chase Daniel — guys that have been in this league for the amount of years they have — they automatically respect a guy like that, just because they know he’s been there, done that.”

A LIFE OF FAMILY, FOOTBALL AND FRIENDSHIPS: THE ANDY REID STORY

The clock says 3:30 a.m.

The weather is bitter cold and it's hours before many of those he works with will be at the office, but it doesn't matter to him. There is work to do and even more importantly, there is somewhere he will soon have to be.

It's 1992 and Andy Reid is the new tight ends coach for the Green Bay Packers. After 10 years at the collegiate level, he was given an opportunity by an old friend to reunite in the NFL.

The drive to the office is short, normally less than 10 minutes. He, his wife, Tammy, and their five children live close enough to make this work.

The 3:30 a.m. arrival wasn't just about putting in the time at his new job or competing to get there first with his fellow assistant coaches—something that was par for the course with that group, but because of something far more important to Andrew, as only Tammy calls him.

Family.

The only thing in his life that would ever trump his love for football would be his love for family.

"He would go in at these crazy hours and then he would come home by a quarter to 7 and do breakfast with the kids," Tammy explained. "He then would drive one group to school and I would take the others."

It was a routine.

The early mornings at the office were a way for Reid to get some work done, but then get home to spend some quality time with his family before their day got started, even though his had already been going for four hours.

In this way, he wouldn't fall behind in either of his duties—helping scheme ways for his old friend, Mike Holmgren, to find success on offense, while also staying true to his most important job—being a father.

It's a balance he and Tammy have worked on together as a football family for the last 34 years, and through all of those years, the foundation of family, friendship and respect for those who have helped them along the way has always grounded the two through a life in the spotlight.

"He just had this air about him"

Andrew and Tammy were students together at Brigham Young University, and as fate would have it, both enrolled in the Fundamentals of Tennis class together.

"He had this air about him—this confidence," Tammy recalled of Andrew, a member of the BYU football team, "but he wouldn't ask me out, and I'd never not had a guy that I wanted to ask me out not ask me out. So the second half of the semester, since it's a half credit, we played badminton. We were playing after he had already beaten me at tennis and I'm like, 'Well, I could beat you at racquetball.'"

He's like, 'OK, well let's go play racquetball.'"

All of Tammy's friends knew the day they were going to play at the Smith Fieldhouse on the campus of BYU, and they were all peeking through the windows as the game, or for lack of a better term, shellacking, went on.

"He killed me," she laughed. "Even though I'm really good, he killed me."

After the game was over, they sat together in the bleachers and that's when Andrew asked Tammy out to a movie that Friday night.

Their first official date would be on December 7—the anniversary of Pearl Harbor.

While Tammy was so nervous that she can't recall the movie they saw that night, she can recall the date because of how much it meant to him.

It's a day that has always been important to Andrew as both his father and uncle were in the Navy during World War II. His father was sent to Pearl Harbor as one of the first responders, while his uncle's ship was out in the Pacific at the time and was hit by a torpedo. He thankfully lived to tell about it.

But their date led to another, and another, and just like that—things had gotten serious.

It wouldn't be long before Tammy found herself at one of the most historic college football games in history—sitting with his parents, and the lessons she learned from that game still hold true to her today.

It was the 1980 Holiday Bowl, commonly known to BYU fans as "The Miracle Bowl."

The game featured a pass-happy BYU offense led by future NFL quarterback Jim McMahon and his 409.8 yards passing per game, which led all of college football that year, as did the team's 46.7 points per game.

They were matched up against an SMU team that couldn't have been more different offensively. They were led by the backfield tandem of Craig James and Eric Dickerson, who were nicknamed the "Pony Express" and would combine to run for more than 330 yards in the game.

Dickerson would later go on to the NFL and a Hall of Fame career in his 11 seasons with the Los Angeles Rams (1983-87), Indianapolis Colts (1987-91), Los Angeles Raiders (1992) and Atlanta Falcons (1993).

Heading into that game back in 1980, BYU had never won a bowl game in their program's history.

With four minutes left, they trailed 45-25.

It was all but over.

"People were walking away and we were up in the nosebleeds," Tammy recalled. "I don't know why we got such bad tickets. I was with his parents, but I'm screaming at people to sit down and saying, 'This game is not over!'"

"They were looking at me like I was crazy. I'm sure his parents thought I was crazy because we didn't know each other very well at the time."

McMahon threw a touchdown to Matt Braga to get the score within two possessions with a little more than 2 minutes remaining in the game.

Then, the first of two low-percentage special teams plays went BYU's way.

First, they recovered the ensuing onside kick.

Just a few plays later, BYU was in the end zone again on a 1-yard touchdown run by Scott

Phillips.

Now they only trailed by 6 points, but time was still an issue.

This time it was the defense's turn to make a play, and they were able to shut down SMU's dominant running game on the next possession, setting up a fourth down.

Then, the second of two miraculous special teams plays happened that gave BYU an opportunity to win.

With less than 20 seconds remaining and trailing by just 6 points, BYU blocked the punt and recovered the ball at the SMU 41-yard line.

Unbelievably, they still had a shot.

The first pass from McMahon fell incomplete deep down the right sideline, and there was time left for just one play.

McMahon, who had already engineered a couple of late touchdowns to get them within striking distance, found Clay Brown on the final play of the game on a miraculous Hail Mary touchdown between several SMU defenders.

The extra point gave BYU a 46-45 victory.

BYU had scored 21 points in the final 2:33 to win the game.

After going winless in their first four bowl appearances as a program, including consecutive Holiday Bowls in the previous two seasons, Edwards and company pulled off one of the greatest comebacks in college football history that night at Jack Murphy Stadium in San Diego.

"That was my first experience with football and trusting that no matter how bleak it looks, I always believe Andrew and his guys will figure out a way to do it," Tammy said.

It's a lesson that would serve her well later in life, when a team would struggle to a 1-5 start, and no matter how bleak it looked, she always trusted that Andrew would figure out a way to get it done.

Tammy and Andrew were married on August 8, 1981, just 232 days after that miraculous win over SMU.

Before BYU, there was John Marshall High School in Los Angeles

Andy Reid grew up in the Los Feliz neighborhood of Los Angeles and lived in the same house until he left for college.

That house, which perched atop the hill on Holly Knoll Drive, was close enough to see the lights of Dodger Stadium at night and sat just a mile away from the famous Hollywood Boulevard.

It was an ethnically diverse neighborhood. Throughout his childhood in Los Angeles and even into his high school years, race relations were volatile, particularly in his neighborhood, but that didn't matter to Reid. All of these children were his friends—the ones he'd begun playing football with when he was 5 years old.

He would be seen as a leader among his peers for keeping things together and uniting his teams.

His father, Walter, worked as a scenic artist. His mother, Elizabeth, was a doctor of radiology.

As a kid, Reid could often be found following his older brother, Reggie, around everywhere.

"Would you get your little brother out of here? I'm sick of him coming up to me and asking for my chin strap," would be the kind of thing Reggie's friends would often say, according to Dick Kiwan, Reid's high school basketball coach and a friend he still talks regularly with to this day. Reid, who was 10 years younger than Reggie, was the ball boy for the John Marshall High School Varsity football team.

He'd do anything he could do to be around his older brother—his hero.

The school, which is where most of the film Grease was shot and would years later be home to Leonardo DiCaprio and Will.i.am, was only a couple of blocks away from their house, so it was easy for Reid to always be around.

All that time hanging around his older brother and playing with the kids in the neighborhood paid off for Reid, who was a standout athlete even before he got to John Marshall.

As a 13-year-old, Reid competed in the national Punt, Pass and Kick competition, towering next to a kid in a now-infamous photo and video.

The competition took place during a Monday Night Football broadcast. As it turned out, the kid behind him was actually in the 8-year-old division. A funny part of the whole thing was the organizers had to go into the Los Angeles Rams locker room to find a jersey that would fit him.

When Reid was a kid, it wasn't just about football though.

"When I first met him, he was always hanging around the gym, always had a basketball in his hand," Kiwan recalled. "After his school was out, he'd be up in the gym shooting baskets or hanging around the football field. I'd start my basketball practices and have to shoo him out of the gym."

Once he got to high school, Reid was one of just two sophomores to make the varsity football team. He recalls to this day the lessons he learned from those upperclassmen.

"I remember the seniors getting after myself and the other kid and really making us grow up," Reid recalled. "They did a good job with that. They tested us."

By the time he was a senior, Reid had established himself as one of the best athletes in the area, lettering in football, basketball, baseball and track. He was named the most inspirational athlete on his football team as a senior, playing along the offensive and defensive lines while also handling the kicking duties.

"Andy is a great guy, but when he got on the football field, something clicked and he was nasty," Kiwan recalled.

He led the team to a 7-3 record that final year, with three of the games being decided on his game-winning field goals.

"The school had traditionally not been a great football school," Reid recalled. "My senior year, we were able to get ourselves in the second round of the city playoffs, which was a big thing at that time."

Reid's affinity for physicality carried over to the other sports he played as well, which was a problem, particularly in basketball.

Kiwan remembered one game in particular against Hollywood High School during his junior season.

"I put him in at forward and he had four fouls in less than 2 minutes," Kiwan said laughingly. "I remember pulling him out because he was just dribbling down the floor and running over people. I remember taking a timeout and saying, 'Andy, what are you doing?' and he looked at me like, 'What?'"

“The competitive juices were flowing so much from leaving football and getting into basketball, he couldn’t help himself.”

While the humor may not have been on both sides of that situation at the time, the relationships Reid developed with his high school coaches would become lifelong friendships, ones that would include inside jokes they remember three decades later.

Kiwan shared a story about a day Reid came to the coach’s office, a place he’d often frequent between classes, complaining about his ankles.

“He came in the PE office and said ‘My ankles are killing me,’” recalled Kiwan. “The defensive coach, who Andy was really close with, told him, ‘Aw, you’re OK, you damn baby. There’s nothing wrong with that ankle.’”

But it’s what happened next that makes the story memorable more than 30 years in the making.

“Wait, we’ve got something here that I can put on that that’s going to really help that. It’s a special solution from Chicago,” Kiwan said he told Reid, “and so I went into the coach’s shower room and got some of that powdered soap out of the container, mixed it up into a paste and put it on a towel. I came out and said, ‘Andy, we got this special solution from Chicago. What’s going to happen now is you’re going to take your shoe off, get your ankle up on the desk and we’re going to put this paste on it.’

“But I don’t want you to move your foot. You just keep it absolutely still for 20 minutes until we come back, and you’ll feel that it’s going to draw that pain right out of there and that swelling is going to go down and that thing is going to feel 100 percent better.”

“We leave, have some coffee, come back about 20 minutes later and there he is in the same position on the table sitting up with that paste on there. I said, ‘I know that it feels better,’ and the defensive coach said, ‘Oh yeah, absolutely, it has to feel better.’

“I said, ‘Did you feel the pain coming out?’”

“Andy said ‘Yeah, you know, I’m moving it and it feels pretty good.’

“The other coach said, ‘Stand up on it, let’s see how it is,’ and Andy said ‘Oh yeah, look at that, it’s 100 percent better. You know, I think this really helped me.’

The coaches obviously had a good time with Reid, who was quick to recall this story a few years ago when they were visiting him during his time as the head coach of the Philadelphia Eagles.

“We were back in Philadelphia and he was taking us around showing us the training facilities and I said, ‘This is great, but one thing I want to know, do you have the special solution from Chicago?’ and he said ‘Oh, that was BS. I knew that was BS.’

“And I said, ‘Oh yeah? You sat there for 20 minutes.’”

The ankle was fine, and Reid played well enough his senior year to start talking with some colleges in the area about playing football at the next level.

Growing up in Los Angeles at the time meant, as a football fan, it was all about USC. They had talked with Reid coming out of high school but didn’t offer him a scholarship. They actually recommended that he go to a particular junior college and develop there as a player and they could follow his progress.

That school was Glendale Community College.

“I was very lucky to do that,” Reid said. “I mean they wore the exact same colors as USC, but the offensive line coach there had been an All-American at USC—Mike Scarpace. “He had a tremendous influence on me and really taught me how to play offensive line.”

Scarpace spent his college days blocking for future Kansas City Chiefs running back Mike Garrett, who ran in the famous “65 Toss Power Trap” touchdown from 5 yards out in Super Bowl IV.

After Garrett was drafted and signed by the Chiefs in 1967, Scarpace blocked for a junior college transfer who would go on to make plenty of headlines throughout his football career and life—running back O.J. Simpson.

The connection that might be the most interesting of them all is that Scarpace’s college teammate was Mike Holmgren, who would become a huge part of Reid’s life a few years later, and for many more after that.

“We had a great head coach in Jim Sartoris and John Cicuto—the defensive coordinator. All these guys, I’m actually very close with, so I’m very lucky in that way.”

Reid earned honorable mention All-American honors after a standout season at Glendale, helping coach Sartoris earn his first championship.

After developing as a player under Scarpace and company at Glendale, Reid had a scholarship lined up to play at Stanford to further his playing career.

“At the time, you could talk to colleges and take visits before your bowl game,” he explained. “So my last game at Glendale, we go to a little bowl game against Saddleback College. I had already been scheduled to go to Stanford and had been accepted, and then I blew out my knee in that game.”

Just like that, Reid’s plans had changed.

His good friend and the guy playing next to him along the offensive line, Randy Tidwell, was looking at BYU and mentioned to Reid that he should come with him on his visit now that his future was up in the air. Reid agreed and wound up enjoying the trip.

LaVell Edwards, the iconic coach at BYU who won 257 career games and was inducted into the College Football Hall of Fame in 2004, had already been looking at Tidwell, and after the visit, Reid became part of the package of getting both of them to BYU. Edwards quickly noticed how perceptive Reid was about playing along the offensive line.

“We’d be out there practicing and working, and there’d be questions coming up on how to pick up a certain blitz,” Edwards noted. “I noticed a lot of times [Reid] was helping the guard, the tackle or the center next to him, to make sure they understood what to do if there was some kind of stunt or whatever they did.

“I remember saying at the time that this guy’s got an unusual feel and knowledge of the game.”

What stood out to Edwards is how Reid wanted to understand more than just his responsibilities. “He not only learned and knew what his assignment was, but also the reasons why and the concept of what you’re trying to do,” Edwards recalled. “A lot of players didn’t have that concept or ability, but Andy did. He had a feel for it.

“That’s one of the things I admire most about him, and it made me think the more I was around him, the more I watched him, I realized this guy could be a very good coach.”

At the time, coaching wasn’t on Reid’s radar.

At different points in his life, he wanted to be a doctor, or even a writer—something he dabbled in during his time at BYU.

Reid had kept a journal since he was in 11th grade, and during a trip back from Hawaii with the football team at BYU, he was talking with one of the writers of the Provo Daily Herald about his passion for writing. He was minoring in English and the guy asked him if he'd be interested in writing a weekly column for the paper.

Reid agreed to do it.

"I wrote about our guys and had fun with it," he explained. "It was kind of Jim Murray-ish (the legendary LA Times writer who often used humor and wit in his articles). I'm not going to tell you I was a great writer, but it was fun to do.

"I had a dream when I was a kid to write for Sports Illustrated, but it never worked out that way," explained Reid, who would soon find his true calling. "It wasn't until just before my senior year that coach Edwards asked me if I had ever thought about coaching."

That's how it started.

A simple question followed by an offer.

The player who had made it a point to understand everyone's responsibilities, not just his own, and would work with his teammates to make sure they understood what they were doing on any given play, would soon embark on a coaching career that has helped shape the lives of hundreds of others lucky enough to cross paths with him.

"I was very fortunate to play for him," Reid said of Edwards. "He's a tremendous human being and a big influence on me not only as a player, but even now as a coach.

"I talk to him once a week to this day."

Reid became a graduate assistant football coach for BYU in 1982.

"He immediately stood out to me," Mike Holmgren, who was responsible for the graduate assistants at the time, said of his first impression of Reid.

It was Holmgren's first year at BYU after spending the previous three years coaching the quarterbacks at San Francisco State under the legendary Vic Rowen.

Before that, Holmgren had spent the previous 10 years coaching high school in the San Francisco area. Rowen had given him his first opportunity above the high school level.

"It was just his work ethic, his personality," Holmgren added. "I think we just hit it off right away. I gave him more responsibility the more I knew him, and whenever I needed things done in my house or whatever, he'd always volunteer to come over, so we'd work together and we'd laugh together."

Holmgren came to coach the quarterbacks at BYU, and he had a pretty good one to groom after they lost McMahon, who was the No. 5-overall pick in the 1982 NFL Draft by the Chicago Bears.

McMahon would be a two-time Super Bowl champion during his 15-year NFL career.

The young quarterback Holmgren was there to help develop was a guy by the name of Steve Young, who would also go on to a pretty good football career.

The life of a traveling coach begins

Reid stayed at BYU as a grad assistant for just the one year in 1982, and his next opportunity would come through the help of Edwards.

"[Edwards] had hired Holmgren on the recommendation from Rowen," Reid explained. "In return, a year later, it was like a trade out. 'I did you a favor, now you have to take this young guy that has no experience and do me a favor and hire him.'

"That's how I got to San Francisco State."

Rowen and Edwards were both, at different times, presidents of the College Football Coaches Association. They were on the board together and had known each other forever.

The opportunity for Reid at San Francisco State was about learning how to coach—Rowen had a knack for developing coaches. It was a teachers college and the athletes were non-scholarship, so there wasn't much pay and the coaches had to do a lot of different things to make ends meet.

"Every Tuesday and Thursday, the coaches would sell hot dogs to earn money for the football program," Tammy recalled of that time. "Andrew would sell hot dogs in the middle of the commons, you know, out in the middle of campus."

At the time they moved, Tammy and Andrew had one son, Garrett, but it wouldn't be long before another son, Britt, came into the picture.

Their family would continue to grow with every new opportunity.

"I'd put the boys in the wagon and we'd walk over to campus and get hot dogs," she recalled.

That money went to the football department, so there was still the matter of their own money that had to be made to make ends meet.

Reid was actually umpiring baseball games the night after Britt, his second son, was born.

"He couldn't come visit me until he had umpired three games," Tammy recalled. "They always started after dinner so he would make $10 or $15 a game and he did that as much as he could. I remember the night after Britt was born, he came in his gear, wearing the dark navy pants, the light blue shirt, the little pouch with the brush to wipe off the plate, the clicker and he came to see me the next night.

"I was just like, 'Oh, my poor husband.'"

While money was scarce, that didn't stop Reid from having his offensive linemen over once a week to watch film and study.

Each night they came over, Tammy would make Mississippi Mud Pie to feed them.

"We were super poor," Tammy explained. "I can't even stress how much we did not have enough money to do this every week, but Andrew loved his guys and so I would have them over once a week and make it for them."

He was only a few years older than the players he was coaching, but Reid felt like it was important to create a family atmosphere amongst his little faction of the team, so these weekly get-togethers were important to him.

One of the guys at that weekly get-together was Tom Melvin, who was his only senior offensive lineman on that team. Melvin is now the tight ends coach for the Chiefs.

Selling hot dogs, umpiring baseball games, in addition to being a coach—all of this was done because of his love for football.

With a wife, two young sons and a plethora of responsibilities, Reid knew it was important to take advantage of the time he had with Rowen because of all the sacrifices they were making.

"I've got this coach that's tougher than shoe leather, but he was a teacher of coaches," Reid noted. "He'd have a banana, an onion bagel and a glass of water, and this was at 6 in the morning. He'd go 'If you were presented this defense right here, give me the top three runs and the top three throws you would do.'

"Then he had me explain to him how I would coach every player out there. He'd do this every day to me and just grill me. I was just out of college and he'd just grill me and grill me."

This is how one of the greatest coaches in NFL history got indoctrinated in the coaching world.

At the crack of dawn every morning, Rowen, who would develop three NFL head coaches during his time at San Francisco State in Reid, Holmgren and Dirk Koetter, would make Reid explain how he would coach the techniques to every player on the field for multiple plays against multiple defenses.

It's a process that worked, and while this may have been an early link in the chain of Reid's Xs-and-Os development, the next opportunity would be helped along by an old friend—a pattern we'd continue to see, but was only made feasible through a determination unlike anything his next coach had ever seen.

"I knew LaVell Edwards really well," said Larry Kentera, the longtime defensive coordinator at Arizona State.

At Arizona State, Kentera coached the likes of future NFL Hall of Famer and Kansas City Chiefs legend Curley Culp before eventually leaving for a head coaching position at Northern Arizona in 1985.

After three years grinding out a life financially at San Francisco State, Reid learned of an opportunity with Kentera at Northern Arizona, and he asked his old coach and the guy who got him started in coaching, Edwards, to put in a good word for him.

"[Edwards] gave [Reid] a high recommendation," said Kentera.

Edwards made that call, but it wasn't going to suffice for Reid. He wanted this job.

"I no sooner put the phone down with Lavell before it rings again," Kentera recalled.

"Coach, this is Andy Reid. I want this job. I'm interested in this job."

"I said, 'Andy, I'm in a hurry right now. I'm not going to do anything with the job until I get back from a recruiting trip. When I get back from Sacramento, I'll give you a call back.'

What happened next is a reason Reid is where he is today.

"When I get to Sacramento, guess who was there waiting for me when I got off the plane?" Kentera explained. "Andy Reid was standing right there."

"He said, 'Coach, I want that job.'"

Reid had found out what flight Kentera was on and made the two-hour drive from San Francisco to Sacramento to wait for him at the airport.

Kentera had no choice after that. Reid was his guy, although he did follow up with Edwards again just to be sure about a guy that would go to that kind of length to get a job.

It wasn't just coach Reid moving for a new opportunity. Tammy and their two sons would obviously be affected by this life on the move.

"I'd never known a coach, I'd never been with a coach," she explained. "I had no idea what our lives were going to be like. I was just a roll-with-the-punches kind of girl and I'm a bloom-where-you're-planted kind of girl. So we'd move. I'd get everybody ready, I'd get the house ready, we'd sell the house, do whatever we needed to do, jump in the U-Haul, and we'd just move.

"It was just a part of life. You were so young that you didn't even know that it was crazy, that what you were doing was crazy."

Reid had actually left immediately to begin working in Flagstaff after he accepted the job, which meant it was Tammy's job to pack up the house and get everything their family owned to their new home in Arizona.

Luckily, she had help from one of Reid's former players at San Francisco State and a guy he had brought on as a graduate assistant, Tom Melvin. Melvin helped her pack the house and actually drove the U-Haul with all of their family's belongings to Arizona.

Reid would spend just one year at Northern Arizona, a school his brother, Reggie, attended for a short time, but that amount of time was long enough for Kentera to get an idea of the kind of coach and man Reid ultimately was.

"We had finished our spring ball that year and so I took all of the guys on the bus, we went out to the country, took a lot of drinks and all," Kentera explained. "Once we got out there, Andy came over and sat by me and said, 'Coach, I don't drink.'

"I said, 'That's okay. I don't care whether you drink or not.'

"He said, 'You don't?'

"I said, 'Nope.'

"He said, 'You know I'm Mormon?'

"I said, 'Sure, I know you are. I respect you because you don't drink.'"

Reid's Mormon faith has been an integral part of his life since he was baptized on August 2, 1980, as a junior at BYU.

It wouldn't be long before another opportunity came calling.

Dirk Koetter had spent the 1985 season with Reid at San Francisco State as the offensive coordinator, and he had moved on to the University of Texas-El Paso when Reid had left for NAU.

UTEP was an option for Reid at that time as well, but he wasn't interested.

"I said it's a graveyard for coaches," Reid admitted. "I said that and so I went to Northern Arizona. I didn't even want to talk to them."

Then he got a phone call from an old friend a year later.

"I remember Dirk calling when we were in Flagstaff," Tammy recalled. "I remember getting the call and saying, 'Dirk, you better not be calling about another job. We haven't been here but one season.'

"And he's like, 'Just let me talk to Andy, Tam.'

"Sure enough, it was for a job, and that's why we only lived in Flagstaff for 11 months, 23 days. I don't know if I'll ever forget that call. I was like, 'Oh my gosh, we just bought a house. We're settled. We have kids. It's great here.'

"But, you've got to move on."

Reid said the difference for him on UTEP this time around was that Edwards, who was in the same conference as UTEP—the WAC, told him the new coach there, Bob Stull, was doing good things with the program.

So Reid went to interview with UTEP, and after meeting with Stull, Koetter and company, was taken out to lunch by their young strength and conditioning coach, a guy by the name of Dave Toub.

Koetter is now the head coach of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Reid ultimately got the job and left a good situation at Northern Arizona, where he was working with Kentera, Melvin and an offensive coordinator named Brad Childress. Their paths would cross again.

The new offensive line coach after Reid left was Bill Callahan, who is currently the offensive line coach for the Washington Redskins. Within the few years after Reid left NAU, Marty Mornhinweg and Darrell Bevell would also be a part of the program.

Mornhinweg is currently the quarterbacks coach with the Baltimore Ravens, while Bevell, who played at NAU in 1989, is the offensive coordinator for the Seattle Seahawks.

It's an impressive group of coaches to have worked at NAU all around the same time.

"I was just fortunate enough to get these guys together," Kentera explained. "They all went on to bigger things and all, and the reason they got to where they did was because they were that good."

Reid would spend two years at UTEP working under Stull as their offensive line coach.

During that time, Stull noticed how well Reid could manage his players—something that would be a common trait described of the former offensive lineman.

"He had a way that you always knew he was on your side," Stull explained. "He'd get on you, but you knew you probably deserved it. He was never a yeller, a screamer or harsh like that, but he'd get on you pretty good if you weren't doing the right effort and learning what you're supposed to be learning. The offensive line guys really liked him a lot because, again, he was a great teacher. He wouldn't let you get away with anything.

"He worked them hard, but he could also laugh. He could see something funny, they could make fun of him about something and he was all right with that. He had a really good sense about him like that."

In two years at UTEP, team went a combined 17-7 and picked up their first 10-win season in 1988, a year that ended with an Independence Bowl loss to Southern Miss and their young playmaking quarterback—Brett Favre. But soon, the Reid family was on the move again after Stull accepted the head coaching position at the University of Missouri.

The family had grown by one more while they were in El Paso as their first daughter, Crosby, was born.

Koetter was actually offered the head coaching position at UTEP after Stull had accepted the job at Mizzou and wanted Reid to stay with him in Texas, but Koetter ultimately declined the job and they both ended up heading to Columbia with Stull.

Reid would spend the next three years coaching the offensive line at Mizzou.

"It was an opportunity to coach in an awesome conference—the Big Eight," Reid explained. "You're talking about when Oklahoma and Nebraska were at their peak. Colorado was one of the best teams in the country.”

He was on the sidelines for the infamous “fifth-down” game, in which the University of Colorado and their star running back Eric Bieniemy would be given an extra down with just seconds remaining because of an official’s mistake.

The extra down gave the Buffaloes another chance to score, which they did.

“Eric Bieniemy cheated,” Reid laughingly said about the game.

Bieniemy went on to finish third in the Heisman Trophy balloting that year. He’s currently the running backs coach for the Chiefs.

After three seasons in Columbia, Reid would once again get a call from an old friend about an opportunity.

This time it brought back a conversation Tammy remembered having during a dinner they had years before when they were at BYU.

“We went to dinner at Mike’s and he asked Andy, ‘If I ever get a head coaching job, would you want to come with me?’

“And [Reid was] like, ‘Sure!’”

Well, it happened. Mike Holmgren had just been hired as the new head coach of the Green Bay Packers.

“When I got the Packers job, I phoned Andy first,” Holmgren recalled. “I said, ‘You’re going to be coaching tight ends. You’re going from coaching 10 or 12 guys, down to coaching probably three.’”

The NFL wasn’t on Reid’s radar at the time.

While he had spent a lot of time during the offseason those years at Mizzou driving to Kansas City to talk with Howard Mudd, the offensive line coach with the Chiefs, it wasn’t about finding a way to the NFL. It was about learning as much as he could to develop his guys back at Mizzou.

“I never had that goal,” Reid explained of the NFL. “I know people say that. You’d love to have that opportunity, but I was always big on breaking it down to the things I controlled and not worrying about the things I couldn’t control. That’s the way you’re raised as a lineman I think.

“So I figured if I worked hard and I kept my nose clean, good things would happen.”

Initially, Reid was skeptical about coaching tight ends. He had been coaching offensive line at the collegiate level for the past 10 years.

“When I was at UTEP and we moved to Missouri, there were a lot of seniors, so they were kind of moving on with us, but this was a different deal. None of the coaches were going with me.”

Their fourth child, another daughter, Drew-Ann, was born when they were in Columbia.

At the time the Green Bay offer came along, Tammy was also six months pregnant with their fifth child and third son, Spencer.

All these years coaching and the NFL had never been the goal.

Then, all of the sudden, from selling hot dogs to driving to meet strangers in airports for coaching jobs, it had all come to this—Reid was now an NFL coach.

He had reached the highest level of football in the world, and he was just getting started.

"He just ate all of the saltine crackers."

In his first year as a head coach at any level, Holmgren, who had spent the previous six years with the San Francisco 49ers as quarterbacks coach (1986-88) and then offensive coordinator (1989-91), put together one of the best coaching staffs in NFL history.

In 1992, the Packers had five future NFL head coaches on staff in Reid, Jon Gruden, Dick Jauron, Ray Rhodes and Steve Mariucci. They combined to win more than 550 games in the NFL.

It was an exciting time for a group of young, talented coaches.

"I love football and had a lot to prove," Gruden explained of that time. "Andy had a lot of love for the game and a lot to prove, too. It was all so exciting being in the NFL at a young age, being with Mike Holmgren—the Green Bay Packers—having a chance to show we belonged."

The talent and passion they had for the game manifested itself into numerous competitions between Gruden, Reid, Mariucci and company.

"In our staff meetings, you could throw out ideas on the table, and if it was a good idea, I'd stick it in the game plan," Holmgren explained, "and so, what I didn't realize is they kept track of that. They'd go back and give a hard time to each other about that."

Gruden remembers these times vividly.

"It became a competition between us young guys to see who could come up with the next great play," he explained. "We wanted to impress Mike Holmgren. We wanted him to trust our research and to put that play in the game plan."

"I was oblivious to it, which is kind of funny, actually," Holmgren said laughingly, "but that's one of the things that made the staff great because they were bright guys and they cared a lot."

After five straight winning seasons and a Super Bowl championship in 1996, Holmgren was put to the test of how much he valued Reid being on his staff.

In 1997, Mariucci was offered the head coaching position with the San Francisco 49ers, and he wanted Reid to be his offensive coordinator.

"I said no," Holmgren noted. "I blocked it and said, 'Look, I need you. I can't let you go.'"

At the time, the NFL allowed you to protect or stop one coach from leaving your staff.

"Andy was upset about it and I don't blame him," Holmgren, who was receiving numerous calls at the time from everyone in San Francisco about letting Reid join them, recalled.

Holmgren then made a promise to Reid that he'd help him get a head coaching position and that he'd be coaching the quarterbacks that next season in Green Bay.

"I moved a really good offensive line coach to coach tight ends, then quarterbacks and Brett Favre, specifically," Holmgren noted. "That's quite a jump. That's not easy to do."

Reid had initially made the move to tight ends to learn more about the passing game, and now he was coaching a player who would go on to become one of the greatest passers in NFL history.

It caught the attention of the Packers director of college scouting at the time, a guy by the name of John Dorsey.

"As coach Holmgren was shifting him around and through the process, I just watched him grow," Dorsey noted. "You just saw his ability to handle players and knew this guy was pretty special."

Much like Kentera, Stull and everyone had always said about him before, Reid had just the right temperament to be a good teacher—regardless of the position he was coaching.

“Most of the time, Andy had a clear head and I was the emotional one,” Holmgren noted. “He would have to get in the middle between me and Favre, and he would kind of take a bullet for him. Sometimes I'd lay it on Andy and I'd come down hard on him, but that was kind of the role of a quarterback coach.

“Whether it was Mariucci or Reid, instead of going after the player, sometimes I would go after the coach, and the player would feel bad and then look out for him.”

It was the way Holmgren ran his ship, and with more than 170 career wins, it obviously worked. They were special relationships he had with his assistant coaches, but the one with Andy was always strong—dating back to their time together at BYU.

“They were like sons to me,” Holmgren, who has four daughters, said, “but Andy, I don't know, we just hit it off. It was just a friendship. I was his boss, but I hope he would say it was a friendship—that's the way I wanted it to be.”

It's not hard to see the resemblance between the two either.

“We're both big guys,” Holmgren laughed. “We both have mustaches. Every once in a while, somebody will come up and mistake me for Andy in the airport, or they would do the same thing and come up and ask him for an autograph thinking it was me.

“So Andy once told me, sometimes [if things were going well], I'd just sign your name.”

Obviously, this was a friendship Reid cherished as well.

“He told me that everything that I've ever said he has written down,” Holmgren said. “He had taken notes on everything I've ever said. When I worked for Bill Walsh, I took very, very clear notes, but Andy I think took it to the next level.”

Those notes, along with all the others he had taken dating back to his days at San Francisco State, put him in position to be ready for a head coaching position when one might eventually become available, something Holmgren had already said he'd helped Reid with when the day came.

After the 1998 season, Holmgren interviewed with the Seattle Seahawks for a position that, in addition to being their head coach, would include more responsibility on the personnel side.

“When I interviewed for the Seattle job, I was also going to come back and interview with the Eagles,” Holmgren explained. “I phoned (Eagles owner) Jeffery Lurie and said listen, I'm scheduled for the interview, but I'm staying in Seattle, I'm sorry, thank you for everything.

“But here's who you have to hire—you have to hire Andy Reid.”

Lurie listened, and for the first time in 10 years, an NFL head coach was hired after working as a positional coach, not a coordinator.

Over the next 14 years, under Reid's watch, the Eagles went to the playoffs nine times, won six division titles and travelled to five NFC Championship games and one Super Bowl.

Doug Pederson, who had spent the previous three years with Holmgren and Reid in Green Bay as a backup to Favre, had the opportunity to play for both in 1999. Holmgren had a place for him in Seattle and Reid had one in Philadelphia.

Pederson ultimately chose Philadelphia, and he'd learn under Reid, both as a player and later as a coach for eight years, before getting his big opportunity after the 2015 season, serendipitously, in Philadelphia as their new head coach.

“He always kept those spiral notebooks,” Pederson noted of Reid. “It’s something I learned to do, document your history. He just had volumes of that stuff going back to his early days in coaching. If it’s a scheduling issue, like around Thanksgiving or Christmas, he’ll look back at what they did three or four years ago in a similar situation and know what to do.”

These notes also included practice schedules, Super Bowl itineraries, bye-week schedules and draft philosophies.

He was meticulously organized.

“When you think of him, [you think of] consistency, reliability, hard work and a genuine care about the details,” Gruden noted. “You know, as a player, as a secretary, as an offensive coordinator—how we’re going to set this drill up. Just meticulous detail and maniacal preparation, along with genuine heart. If you did a bad job, he knew how to deal with you and say the right thing.

“That goes right back to those days at Green Bay, being in there at 3:30 in the morning. He just ate all of the saltine crackers.”

“He had a clear vision for how he liked to operate”

After 14 years in Philadelphia and just three losing seasons, Reid was fired by the Eagles on Monday, December 31, 2012.

It was the first time in his 30 years of coaching that he had been fired from a job.

Just two days later, the Chiefs, who had just moved on from their head coach, Romeo Crennel, on that Monday as well, made it their mission to bring Reid to Kansas City.

They flew to Philadelphia Tuesday night and scheduled an interview with Reid that was to last three to four hours on Wednesday at the airport in Philadelphia.

“Not only did Clark [Hunt] come, but he brought everybody with him,” Reid recalled of that interview. “It was like the whole front office of the Kansas City Chiefs parked in this private plane area meeting room they had set up. So I got to meet everybody.”

Reid recalled his first impression of Hunt at that meeting.

“He was very aggressive,” Reid recalled. “He wanted to find out first if I still wanted to coach. Once he found that out and felt comfortable, he made sure that we covered every base.”

The Reid family had been through a lot over the previous year, and after 30 years of grinding it out day after day, there was an obvious question as to whether or not he was going to want to take some time to step back and breathe.

“What stood out to me right away was his energy and passion for coaching,” Hunt recalled. “I thought he might be ready to take a break, but I could tell from the start that he was ready to go, and we clicked almost immediately.

“I could tell in the interview that he had a clear vision for how he liked to operate, and I think that comes from experience, obviously, but I also think that’s just his personality. He communicates very well, is highly intelligent and an excellent teacher.”

What was supposed to be a three to four-hour interview all of the sudden turned into a nine-hour conversation, which put Tammy, who was waiting at home, in a strange position when a limo showed up to take Reid to the airport to fly out for an interview with another team.

“I’m sitting there and all of a sudden I look out the door and there’s a limo driver,” Tammy recalled. “I walk out there and I go, ‘What are you doing?’”

“He said, ‘I’m here to pick up Andy Reid.’”

“This is hours after he left, so I’m calling him, texting him and I’m getting nothing. I didn’t know what to do so I called (his agent) Bob LaMonte, and Bob said, ‘He’s not going on that interview. Tell the guy to just go.’”

“I said, ‘Really?’ And he goes, ‘Yeah.’”

Reid came home from the interview and talked everything over with Tammy, and ultimately, they decided that Kansas City was the right place for them.

It’s a decision that has profoundly affected the Chiefs franchise.

Reid was announced as the new head coach of the Chiefs on January 4, 2013, and just a week later, his good friend from the Packers, John Dorsey, was hired as the general manager.

In the three years that Dorsey, Reid and company have guided the franchise, the Chiefs have put together three straight winning seasons and have had two playoff berths, including the team’s first playoff win in more than two decades. Together they have helped establish a winning culture within the entire organization.

For Reid, the ability to have made this transformation started with the leadership at the top.

“I love the Hunts, the entire family and the way they go about their business,” Reid said. “I love Clark’s leadership ability. He had big shoes to fill and I think he’s progressed and taken this to another level in today’s National Football League.”

“He’s a brilliant person. He’s got a great mind and he’s going to shoot you straight.”

In the six years before Reid arrived in Kansas City, the Chiefs had won a total of 29 regular season games. In the last three years—half of that time—Reid has led the Chiefs to 31 wins.

It can’t be shot any straighter than that.

One of the reasons for that has been because of the play of quarterback Alex Smith, who came over via trade with the San Francisco 49ers as one of Dorsey and Reid’s first moves after arriving in Kansas City.

From their very first conversation, Smith knew it was going to be a good fit with Reid and the Chiefs.

“He asked me if I knew what a ‘22 Z in’ was,” described Smith.

The play is a staple of the West Coast offense, and Smith knew exactly what it was.

It signified what their relationship would become over the next three years—a symbiotic pairing of two great football minds.

Smith has thrived under Reid over the past three years, putting up the best numbers of his career and leading the team through a tough start to the 2015 season.

While many people on the outside were doubting the team after a 1-5 start, Reid wouldn’t let anyone in that locker room think outside of what they could control.

It’s how he’s approached everything in his life, and it was going to be what ultimately got them to where they wanted to be.

At home, Reid had the unwavering support of Tammy, who had learned long ago while sitting with her boyfriend's parents at the Holiday Bowl in San Diego, to never doubt that a comeback is possible, regardless of how bleak it might look.

"Maybe people don't know this about me but I'm a very positive person and I have the ultimate trust in Andrew as a coach," she mentioned. "We've been through 34 years of coaching and so I never don't think we're going to win.

"Even when we were 1-5, I was like, 'Everyone needs to calm down. Andrew can do this. He'll figure out a way.'"

The unflappable and even-tempered coach did figure out a way, and in doing so, received the praise of an old friend and mentor for what he was able to help achieve.

"I just told him how proud I was of him and what he did this year," Holmgren said of reaching out to Reid via text after the season, "and that extends to when I was still coaching too. We would play a game against his team and I'd look across the field, and of course we're in a battle that day and we're competing like crazy against each other.

"But also, I just had a great sense of pride about the guys that worked with me and how good they were."

Reid's 172 career wins as a head coach put him at No. 15 on the NFL's all-time list, just two shy of tying Holmgren.

"He never forgot where he came from"

It's been a life of football.

"I owe a lot to the sport," Reid explained. "How many guys get to start playing football when they're 5 years old and then continue that as a profession now when they're 57 years old? It's crazy to think about that and all the people I've had the opportunity and privilege to meet in between.

"I've been so lucky all the way through this whole deal."

While much of what Reid gets credit for on the outside is explained through a final standings sheet or a box score on a Monday morning, the things he's done for his players and his staff off the field and the respect they have for him can't ever be quantified.

It's something that goes beyond the field and something that's real.

Eric Berry's now-famous "Fear nothing, attack everything" slogan was something Reid had said, and it became the rallying cry for the best story in all of sports over the past year.

The things he's done for his staff members, going out of his way to help them in different matters, might never make headlines or see the light of day, but will be remembered forever by those he helped because of his sincerity in helping them for the right reasons.

It's a side of him that most will never know, and it's how he'll be remembered by those who do know Reid the person, not just the guy who stands in front of the cameras and answers questions about football.

There's a depth and genuineness there that only those who have known him the longest can truly appreciate. They know where he came from, how hard he worked, how he treated those before he was Andy Reid, the NFL coach, and how he still values those relationships to this day.

He is the man he is today because of the people he looked up to as a kid, and outside of his parents and older brother, those were his coaches.

“I had great high school coaches,” Reid explained. “They were phenomenal and they cared about the kids like no other. Now that I’ve raised kids and I’ve been around more, I see this because I thought it was this way for everybody, and it’s not.

“I still talk to my basketball coach, my football coaches—I talk to all these guys from high school. Half of them raised me; half of them were in my brother’s class. They saw me as a baby.”

Maintaining those relationships keeps him grounded and allows him to never lose sight of how he got to where he is today.

“One of the things we’ve always said about Andy that is so hard to find, is that Andy never forgot where he came from,” Kiwan, who has known Reid longer than most, said. “He maintains his relationships with the guys he played with in high school and even his old coaches.

His position is one of the best coaches in the league right now, and when it’s all said and done, probably NFL history. Currently, only 14 head coaches have ever stood on an NFL sideline and shook hands victoriously more after a game than Reid.

With another 11-win season in 2016, Reid would enter the top 10 in all-time wins.

He’s already in rare company, but it’s the way he’s done it that has earned him respect across the league among his peers.

A few years ago, Reid made his way back to John Marshall High School as he was inducted into their Hall of Fame. In the trophy case, there is the Andy Reid Trophy, given to the school’s best offensive lineman each year.

That school is part of his foundation—a building block of the man he is today.

The field at John Marshall High School was a stone’s throw away from his house, and it didn’t take much convincing for Reid and his friends to hop that 15-foot fence and to play on what used to be a mostly dirt field (before they became sophomores and played on it for real).

Now, his kids don’t have to hop a fence to find a field to help lay their own foundations.

His son, Britt, who was born in San Francisco when Reid was out selling hot dogs to make ends meet, works as an assistant defensive line coach for the Chiefs.

“I think that it’s awesome that he has an opportunity to learn from great coaches,” Reid said of Britt. “Tommy Brasher, Bob Sutton, Gary (Gibbs) and Emmitt (Thomas), these are coaches that have been around the profession, so for a young guy getting into coaching, what great examples here that he’s been lucky enough to be surrounded by.”

Reid’s other son, Spencer, who’s currently a student at the University of Utah, was able to be with his dad on the sideline for the playoff win in Houston.

“Just to see your husband next to your sons, it’s awesome,” Tammy said. “All the pictures we have of them hugging after games, just to know that they’re with their dad and that they get to share this joy together. It’s emotional.”

For Tammy, the life of a coach’s wife isn’t easy, but it’s one that she has loved since her husband accepted that first job in San Francisco.

“I’m the head coach of our family,” she explained. “Even though he is the patriarch and does all these great things for our family, I kind of run everything when he's not around. I let him know where he's needed and what's going on with the kids.

"I also try and take care of him."

After seven stops in this journey, from the West Coast to the Midwest to the East Coast and back, the Reids have enjoyed the last three years in Kansas City.

"We love it here," she explained. "The people are so nice and kind and happy and respectful. I just love the values and the morals of the Midwest. Andrew isn't able to be out in the community like I am because he's working so much, but I'm just out in the grocery store having a great time talking to people in line."

It's a balance they have figured out together.

"It's not just the time he spends working," Tammy explained of what drives her husband. "It's how much he cares about his players and the team and doing everything in his power to help them be successful."

The man known for his work ethic, sincerity and staying true to his roots, often seen in Tommy Bahama Hawaiian shirts, has proven that in a cutthroat business like the NFL, relationships and how you treat people ultimately matters.

"I love the fact that of all the coaching jobs that I ever had, I'm talking from college to the NFL, I've been able to spend more time with my family coaching for him than anyone I've ever worked for," the assistant head coach and receivers coach, David Culley, said of Reid. "It's important to him."

The only thing that would ever trump his love for football is the love for family, and that extends to those he works with.

"He's a very Christian-type man and he cares about people," Holmgren said. "If you've bumped into him somewhere along the way, or created a friendship with him, it stays forever."

It's a life bred of a deep love for the game of football, the respect of those who have come before him and a love for those who helped him along the way.

"He's a historian," Dorsey added. "I bet you he's got his very first playbook from BYU. He's got playbooks upon playbooks—the depth, the knowledge, he has all of that, but at the end of the day, he's got a good heart."

"He's a good man, and to me, that spells it all."

Chiefs Trainer Rick Burkholder Explains His Role, Journey to Kansas City

BJ Kissel

After 23 years as an athletic trainer, the Kansas City Chiefs' Rick Burkholder has earned the respect of those across the NFL.

That could be due to the fact that he's the president of the Professional Football Athletic Trainers Society (PFATS), or because three of his former assistants and an intern are now head athletic trainers with the Philadelphia Eagles, Minnesota Vikings, New Orleans Saints and Miami Dolphins.

But before he started his own NFL head athletic trainer tree, Burkholder learned about the profession at an early age, even though he didn't initially start down that path.

"My dad's an athletic trainer, so it's been in my family," Burkholder, a Carlisle, Pennsylvania native said. "I went to college to play soccer at the University of Pittsburgh and started out as a communications major, but then I decided to become an athletic trainer.

"When I was done playing, I spent some extra time to be an athletic trainer and then it just kind of grew from there."

After getting his Masters degree from the University of Arizona, Burkholder went back to his alma mater, which provided him with the opportunity he needed.

"I was in the right place at the right time," Burkholder explained of how he broke into the NFL. "Mr. Rooney at the Steelers was looking to hire an assistant and he wanted to interview people that had Pittsburgh ties.

"I was at the University of Pittsburgh at the time, so I was fortunate enough to get an interview and get the position."

After three years at the University of Pittsburgh (1991-93), Burkholder spent five seasons as the assistant athletic trainer with the Pittsburgh Steelers (1993-98).

A few years later and due to some fortuitous networking, Burkholder got the opportunity he was looking for just 300 miles east of Pittsburgh.

"When I was in Pittsburgh, our director of college scouting, Tom Modrak, became general manager with the Eagles," he recalled. "He then interviewed me with coach (Andy) Reid to become their head athletic trainer."

The 14 years he spent in Philadelphia as the Eagles head trainer with Reid put Burkholder in a position to be where he is today.

"I think he and I had similar passions for the game," Burkholder said of Reid. "He and I hit it off from that first interview.

"I give him a lot of credit for developing me as an athletic trainer. [Reid] took a chance on me when I was really young and he taught me a lot about how to manage people and how to manage a room.”

In 2013, Reid was hired as the coach of the Kansas City Chiefs.

For Burkholder, who had been given his first head athletic training job by Reid and spent 14 years with him in Philadelphia, that next decision was pretty easy.

“I was pretty sure I was coming with him,” Burkholder said of moving to Kansas City. “I had to talk with my wife to make sure that that was all a go.

“Then, once I met Clark (Hunt), I knew this was where I wanted to be. He’s one of the elite owners in the National Football League and it’s an honor to work for him.”

Burkholder continued.

“I enjoyed my time in Philly and I enjoyed the fans and the pageantry of Philadelphia Eagles football. But it’s hard for me to believe there’s a better game day atmosphere than Arrowhead Stadium.

“Also, it’s hard for me to believe that there’s better people out there than there are in Kansas City. I’m very grateful that I’m able to raise a 14-year-old and an 11-year-old daughter in this environment.”

While the Kansas City community provides an environment for he and his family to call home, Burkholder and his staff provide Chiefs players an environment for the best care possible.

As he leads his team of four in Kansas City, Burkholder also sits as the president of PFATS, which as he explains, has taken on a larger role recently with the focus on safety in the NFL.

“There are 127 members and we have an elected board,” he said of PFATS. “It’s a medical society. We have some dialogue with the National Football League—they listen to us on player safety issues and athletic training issues.”

After 23 years in the NFL, Burkholder has seen changes over that time in the perception and responsibility of what athletic trainers are asked to do.

“It’s changed in the fact that when I got in, our job is not more relevant now, we’re just looked at differently,” he explained. “They rely on us more for information than they ever have, so I think it’s a great time to be an athletic trainer in the National Football League.”

He continued.

“We’re running healthcare facilities now. That’s not just a back room—it’s not just some room in the locker room. There’s MRI and X-ray and they come in to do drug testing; they draw blood and we do procedures in there. It’s a big-time healthcare facility.”

Burkholder said that as medical advancements and more information becomes available, the less reactionary and more proactive in treating and helping players they can be.

“We’ve gotten to the point now where we don’t necessarily want to take care of injured athletes,” he explained. “We want to prevent them from being injured whereas in the past it was ‘OK. So this guy is hurt, now what are you going to do for him?’

“We’re much more proactive.”

While injuries in football are inevitable, the relationship that's developed by the training staff and the player is crucial to the success of both the individual and the team.

One player that had to go through that process last season was defensive lineman Mike DeVito, who was lost for the season with an Achilles injury suffered in Week 1 against the Tennessee Titans.

"If they have an All-Pro team for athletic trainers, Rick (Burkholder) would be the MVP," DeVito said. "He's incredible. The treatment that I got there working with those guys was just top of the line.

"I know [Rick's] had my back in every way. I'm grateful for him."

For Burkholder, that's the kind of relationship he and his staff work to build.

"It's gratifying," he noted. "I'm a believer that all relationships are two-sided, so (DeVito) may brag about the relationship that he has with us, but we brag about the relationship that we have with him too.

"I can't overstate how grateful I am that the players in Kansas City that were here when we got here and the guys that we brought in have accepted our program."

He continued.

"It means a lot to me as a leader of the group and then to my staff because we fight hard to get to that point."

On March 16 in Baltimore, the winners of the 2014 Ed Block Courage Award were announced for each NFL team.

According to the award's website, the prize "honors those National Football League players who exemplify commitments to the principles of sportsmanship and courage. This award is unique in that the recipients are selected solely by a vote of their teammates."

The winner of this prestigious award this year for the Chiefs was tight end Travis Kelce, who with the help of assistant athletic trainer David Glover, came back strong from a knee injury that cost him his rookie season in 2013.

"Travis started getting better instantly," Burkholder said of when Kelce and Glover got together. "So I think it's a real credit to both of them, to Travis and to David—that they could work so closely together."

Kelce led the Chiefs with 67 receptions for 862 yards and five touchdowns last season, and Glover was there with Kelce in Baltimore when he was presented the award.

The Chiefs training staff of Burkholder, Glover, Aaron Borgmann, Evan Craft and Nick Potter work tirelessly behind the scenes to make sure players are getting everything they need to be at their peak performance on the field.

Considering four of Burkholder's former protégés are now head athletic trainers around the NFL, the Chiefs seem to be in good hands.

"I look at my four trainers here as future NFL head athletic trainers," Burkholder said. "I think they're all on a great track. They're eager to learn and they take great pride in their work.

"I love my staff. I wouldn't trade them for anything.

The Life and Career of Chiefs GM John Dorsey

BJ Kissel

September 13, 2016

There were 156 names on the piece of paper - one given to each person in the two adjacent rooms on the second floor of Blum Union on the campus of Missouri Western State University at training camp.

The names were of the 90 players currently on the Kansas City Chiefs roster, a few former legends, such as Len Dawson, Buck Buchanan, Bobby Bell and Willie Lanier, among others, and also included everyone on the football operations staff - from the assistant coaches, to the trainers and security personnel.

It was a quiz, and general manager John Dorsey gave it to members of the communications, video, digital, photography and public relations departments.

For anyone who has ever spent much time around Dorsey, who is entering his fourth year as general manager of the Chiefs, there's a good chance he's asked you a question about NFL history, quizzed you on different college coaches or some random facet of the game that's been the center of his life's work.

But on this particular summer afternoon, everyone was told to fill out this piece of paper and write down the colleges attended of the people listed on the paper. They were given 15 minutes.

It was his way of having fun with everyone.

Dorsey, whose body language and mannerisms as he walked around showed that he couldn't wait to collect and grade them a bit later, always finds a way to interact with everyone in the organization in the best way he knows how - with a combination for his love for the game and a little bit of humor on the side.

This is a man who led an NFL personnel staff in its first year to overhaul a roster that ultimately pulled off the greatest single-season turnaround in franchise history, a nine-win improvement from a 2-14 record in 2012, to 11-5 in 2013.

Last year, the team won a franchise-record 11 straight games, including the first Chiefs playoff win in more than two decades.

On the field, Dorsey's successes are well documented, and off the field, he's passing as well.

This written test, which he did grade and score and later shared with everyone, is just one example of how Dorsey's interactions stretch far beyond the high-level decision-making that comes with running one of the NFL's most historic franchises. It's more than that because it's important to him that he helps develop a culture of inclusion among everyone in the organization.

Dorsey can often be found wandering around the offices in Kansas City and chatting with different members of different departments. He'll leave voicemails for staff members on their birthdays and takes his positive outlook everywhere he goes.

He's accessible, and that ability to relate with everyone from a customer service representative on the third floor of the Chiefs offices to some of the most powerful people in football is why he's found success.

"You want to talk about a relationship facilitating a contract," Tom Condon, who heads up the football division of Creative Artists Agency (CAA) and is widely known as one of the most powerful agents in the NFL, explained of his history with Dorsey. "We went out to dinner and finished Alex Smith's deal. It was just the two of us, and that was because I trusted him and knew we could do something without going through the typical machinations that go on with most of these contract negotiations."

In what ultimately became one of the biggest moves of Dorsey's Chiefs tenure thus far, he sat with Condon at Aixois restaurant in the Brookside area of Kansas City and was able to hammer out the necessary details of a contract over dinner.

Some things didn't have to be discussed because Condon trusted Dorsey, which is a theme among the most powerful agents in football.

Since that move, Smith has gone on to win more games under center for the Chiefs in his first three years than any other quarterback in franchise history.

Dorsey's laidback approach and way of doing business serves him well in this arena, and it also fits in well with the players, particularly Smith.

"[Dorsey] has joked with me from day one, throws (verbal) jabs and pushes, talks crap," Smith laughed. "He's funny and has a great sense of humor with it. He comes into our meetings and he's on the practice field. He's approachable."

Dorsey joked that his first conversation with Smith after the trade may have started over something like asking Smith, "Are you scared?"

It's something Smith couldn't remember or confirm but said it probably wasn't far off. That's just his personality.

Another example of Dorsey's reputation around the league helping facilitate a move was with right tackle Mitch Schwartz, who was surprisingly let go by the Cleveland Browns this offseason after they pulled a contract offer and made him available.

Schwartz's agent, Deryk Gilmore of Priority Sports, echoed the same sentiment as all the others in that Dorsey is easy to work with because "there's no dancing" with him.

Dorsey's professional relationships led to a personal one during his time working with the Green Bay Packers, and it's what initially connected him to Kansas City and later helped make the decision to take the Chiefs job a little easier.

One of Dorsey's friends within the scouting community, Lamonte Winston, a longtime personnel staff member with the Chiefs, wanted to help his wife, Claire, set up Dorsey with a friend she was studying for the bar review with at the time. Her name was Patricia, or Trish, as her friends call her.

They reluctantly agreed, and despite her blowing off the blind date attempt on two separate occasions, they met at Jack Stack barbecue in Kansas City one night.

"I thought he was very gregarious," Trish recalled of that first date. "He was a gentleman."

It's a relationship that began in one of the most iconic restaurants in Kansas City more than two decades before one of the most iconic football organizations in the NFL brought them right back full circle.

"I think people respect the fact that he's meat and potatoes," Trish said of her husband's ability to be transparent and honest in a business that's routinely described as anything but.

Those who know Dorsey best will describe him simply as a "football guy" and family man, who would rather be fishing with his family in Door County, Wisconsin, which is the strip of land sandwiched between Green Bay and Lake Michigan, or watching film of a prospect somewhere.

This balance of family and success is derived from a work ethic developed from watching his father, Walter Dorsey, back home in Leonardtown, Maryland.

While he'll often be referred to as "Dorse" around the Chiefs offices, to those who have known him the longest, he's simply known as "John Michael."

That's what the people back in Leonardtown - a small waterfront town that sits on the Northern end of Breton Bay off the Potomac River - still call him to this day.

It's an area rich in history that's tied to the beginning of our country as St. Clements Island, which sits just a couple of miles up Breton Bay in the Potomac, was just the third settlement in America behind Jamestown and Plymouth Rock. It's also where the country's first Catholic mass was held.

Dorsey's family lineage can be traced all the way back to the first landing at St. Clements Island back in 1634, and the history was never lost upon his family, which has deep political ties to the area.

His great grandfather, Walter B. Dorsey, was first elected to the Maryland House of Delegates in 1911. His grandfather, Judge Philip H. Dorsey, was a Circuit Court Judge who was elected senator in 1926 and the House of Delegates in 1930 and 1934.

His father, Walter, was first elected state attorney in 1954, then elected to the state Senate in 1958. He was elected state attorney again in 1982, 1986, 1990 and 1994.

"His father, who happened to be one of the best attorneys in St. Mary's Country, did a lot of things for people and never charged them," Joe Stone, a family friend, explained. "He was always looking out for the ordinary guy."

"John's father was his idol," Trish explained. "He always wanted to impress his dad - Walter Dorsey was larger than life."

Dorsey's mom was a housewife who later in life became the police commissioner after she had remarried. Dorsey's parents divorced when he was a teenager, and after that, his time was split between Annapolis, where his mother moved when he was in ninth grade, and Leonardtown, where his dad stayed.

Dorsey would always come back to Leonardtown, which is only about 60 miles from Annapolis, for a few months in the summer to stay with his dad.

That's where he learned the value of hard work, as he always had to find a job during the summer. Dorsey spent different summers brick laboring, working on a tobacco farm, cutting grass and later even painting oil barges at a refinery to make extra money.

When he wasn't working, Dorsey was often found by the water.

"John likes to refer to his childhood as a Huckleberry Finn childhood," Trish explained. "He was always outside, he was always playing. Friends of his family would joke about how many trips to the [ER] John took because he really played hard when he was little."

"If I had to do it all over again, I'd probably do it the same way," Dorsey explained. "You were exposed to a lot of different things that you probably aren't exposed to today. You got to explore and be a young man."

Dorsey recalled how he and his friends used to make a little money down by the water when they were about 10 years old.

"There were about 20 piers that stretched for a mile and a half," Dorsey explained of his hometown. "In the early mornings, we'd catch hard crabs off the piers, and by the time we finished, we'd have about a bushel. When the tide went out, we'd walk along the grass beds on the shore and get the soft crabs, probably a couple of dozen or so.

"We'd take them all up to the town and sell them to the seafood man for like 10 bucks."

Dorsey grew up with his older brother, Phil, and sister, Helen, both of whom still live back in Leonardtown.

Phil is an attorney while his sister is active around St. Mary's County with many causes.

"She wants to save the bay," Dorsey explained of Helen. "She wants to save the historical society. She's just got one of those hearts where she wants to save everybody and everything."

A lot of what Dorsey did as a kid somehow revolved around the water, where he spent most of his time, but sports were always a part of the picture for John and his brother.

"In our neighborhood, you get the Baltimore Sun on one side of the street and the Washington Post on the other," Phil explained. "So his idol was (former Baltimore Colts linebacker) Mike Curtis, and mine was (former Washington Redskins linebacker) Chris Hanburger, and we'd go to opposite ends of the yard and just run into each other - tackle each other."

The Dorsey family had a history of attending military school, which started at Leonard Hall Junior Military Academy in Leonardtown. That's where Dorsey went to school for grades five through eight.

"Every boy in my family for the last three generations - probably past my grandfather, they've always gone to military school," Dorsey explained. "My father, my brother went there, and I went there."

This is where he first started playing football, but Leonard Hall didn't have schools in the area to play against, so they'd play JV teams from the area high schools.

"We didn't know any better," Dorsey, who got kicked off the first football team he was ever on because they found out he was too young to play at 8 years old, explained. "I've always played against older guys."

After finishing high school in the Annapolis area, Dorsey spent two years at the historic Fork Union Military Academy in Virginia, where he played football for the legendary coach and longtime Commandant, Robert "Red" Pulliam, who passed away in June of 2015.

"[John's] a guy at practice who always wanted to take on the biggest guy and wanted to prove to everybody that he was the toughest guy out there," Mikey Sullivan, an assistant coach at Fork Union, explained. "The way he played was far and above his amount of talent."

"He was a little undersized but had a big heart, and he played like that at Fork Union. He did very well for us."

Maybe it was all of those times of pretending to be Mike Curtis with his brother that developed Dorsey's toughness on the field, or perhaps it was some kind of intrinsic motivation to come out of the large shadow cast by his father's political life, but Dorsey was good at football.

The decision to go to Fork Union and be introduced to Pulliam, who turned out to be one of the most influential people in his life, was pivotal in Dorsey getting to where he is today.

"Coach Pulliam was a very unique person for all of us," Sullivan, whom Dorsey explained as being a "mini-me" of Pulliam, said. "He had an unbelievable ability to make you believe in yourself - believe you are capable of achieving greatness, and at the same time, hold you accountable for everything you did.

"He was such a good person. You were afraid to ever embarrass him or let him down."

Pulliam spent 40 years in some capacity at Fork Union, most notably as its head football coach and longtime Commandant. He compiled a remarkable record of 170-69-7 during his 26 years as the head coach, serving as director of development, chief operations officer and later as a member of the board of trustees after he finished coaching.

Fork Union has seen more than 80 of their alumni drafted into the National Football League, including quarterback Vinny Testaverde, running back Eddie George, receiver Mike Quick and Dorsey himself, among others.

"For every kid that walks through our doors, if they grow up to be successful fathers, husbands or contributors to society, we won," Sullivan explained. "And with John Dorsey, we won again."

Dorsey was inducted into the Fork Union Military Academy Sports Hall of Fame last June.

Following a two-year standout career at linebacker at Fork Union, Dorsey originally committed to North Carolina, but he changed his mind after being told he wouldn't play until he was a junior. Now free to go where he wanted, Dorsey opted for Connecticut thanks to a connection with an old college teammate of his father at Western Maryland.

Dorsey began his college career as an outside linebacker.

"When I was a freshman, I was on the 'look' team, and we'd give them a good look, like a real good look," Dorsey laughed. "It was like week three or four when I really knew I could play with these guys. And so finally I got the trust of the coaches and they finally decided to put me in there and they put me on the outside."

It wasn't until later that Dorsey would move to a different position, and it ultimately changed his life.

"I think the defining moment [of my career] was when they shifted me to an inside backer," Dorsey recalled. "That kind of changed the whole dynamic of everything."

He explained why he liked playing on the inside.

"You can make more tackles," he laughed. "We faced a lot of Wing-T teams back then, and they could run away from you on the outside but they couldn't run away from you on the inside."

Jan Norris, a next door neighbor, who had actually babysat Dorsey as a young kid when she was a teenager, remembers travelling to many of his games in college.

"His father was scared to fly," Jan explained. "So I got invited to go along with Walter a lot because he wanted somebody to drive him. Luckily, I was able to go along quite a bit because he wanted to go to every game he could to see John Michael play."

Dorsey was a four-year starter (1980-83) for the Huskies football program and was twice named the Yankee Conference's Defensive Player of the Year (1982-83). He still ranks as the all-time leading tackler in program history with 495 career tackles and holds the single-season record with 184 tackles (1983).

After a stellar college career, which recently landed him on the College Football Hall of Fame ballot, Dorsey was drafted by the Green Bay Packers.

At the time, he thought he was going to the Miami Dolphins, but fate had other plans.

"First thing I noticed was meeting Forrest Gregg - going, 'Holy crap, that's Forrest Gregg,'" Dorsey explained of arriving in Green Bay. "That was a big deal to me."

Gregg was a six-time Super Bowl champion who played for 16 seasons in the NFL and is a member of the Pro Football Hall of Fame. He played collegiately at Southern Methodist University (SMU) in Texas, where one of his college teammates was Lamar Hunt, founder of the Kansas City Chiefs and the American Football League (AFL).

When Dorsey was drafted with the No. 99 overall pick in the 1984 NFL Draft, Gregg was the head coach and de facto general manager for the Packers, while former CEO Bob Harlan handled the contract side of things.

A fierce linebacker with an affinity for history, which makes sense considering the lineage of his family and hometown, the opportunity to play for an organization like the Packers meant everything to Dorsey.

"You run out on the field, and then you look over at the alumni section and you quickly understood what it meant to be a Green Bay Packer," Dorsey recalled. "When Otis Anderson was knocked out of bounds, he was in front of the alumni section and the next thing you know, Ray Nitschke's pointing at him, yelling, 'Get up, this is our sideline. Get back to your huddle.'

"You're going, 'My God, it still means something to these guys.'"

It didn't take long for Dorsey to find a role with the Packers, amassing 35 special teams tackles in 1984, which still stands as a team record.

"He was like a lot of guys in a sense of - and I was one of these myself, a good old fashioned [try hard] guy," Larry McCarren, a former teammate with the Packers, explained. "I don't say that in a derogatory sense. It's more admiration because everybody respected John.

"While he wasn't the most gifted or talented guy on the team, [Dorsey] was the guy you could count on to do his job, and to do everything in his power to accomplish that job."

McCarren, who played center, vividly remembers practices against the former "try-hard" linebacker.

"When you took a peek to see who you had to go up against, and it was Dorsey, you knew it wasn't going to be fun," McCarren recalled. "He's going to hit you, and he's going to hit you with everything he's got. There was no such thing as a [brother in-law] play with John.

"If you were going against him, regardless of drill - and there was a lot more rough stuff in those days - you better bring your work gloves, because he's going to be wearing his."

During his five-year career, Dorsey had 130 tackles, 2 fumble recoveries and a pass defensed. Most of his value came on special teams, where he led the Packers in tackles in three of his first four seasons, which helped him earn the nomination to be the Packers special team's captain.

Dorsey was also voted as the Packers "Man of the Year" in 1987 because of his contributions to the Green Bay community, which included heavy involvement with the Wisconsin Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

After suffering a knee injury during warmups of the season opener in 1989, Dorsey was placed on IR and missed the season.

He would never play football again, but former Packers chairman Bob Harlan, who wrote Dorsey's first contract and had grown to respect the man who maximized every bit of his potential, believed in John - the person well enough to offer him a position in the scouting department if he wanted to stay in football.

"I thought he had the personality to form good relationships with the coaches on the college campuses," Harlan recalled. "I just had a great deal of confidence in his future. He had great people skills."

Two years before they won Super Bowl XXXI back in 1996, the Green Bay Packers personnel staff used to take frequent trips to Appleton, a town 30 miles to the southwest of Green Bay and home of the Appleton Foxes, a minor league baseball team affiliated with the Seattle Mariners.

They would spend so much time grinding through film leading up to the draft that their boss, former Packers general manager Ron Wolf, thought it was best to get out and spend some time together.

"It was a moving office," Dorsey explained of those trips with Wolf - his mentor, who was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 2015. "When Ron said, 'Lets go for a drive,' it meant he wanted to talk."

Those drives often led to Appleton, and whether or not it was Dorsey, or any of the other four members of his personnel staff who are now general managers around the league - John Schneider (Seattle Seahawks), Reggie McKenzie (Oakland Raiders), Ted Thompson (Packers) and Scot McCloughan (Washington Redskins) - Wolf's goal was to talk business in a relaxed atmosphere.

"Whether that helped or not, I don't know, but we did that," Wolf explained. "What helped was we got to watch Alex Rodriguez start his career."

Rodriguez had been the No. 1 overall pick in the Major League Baseball Draft by the Mariners the year before, and he was playing for the Foxes.

These NFL personnel guys were just two years shy of putting together a roster that would become a Super Bowl champion, which meant some of the decisions made and discussed during these trips were paramount in achieving that level of success.

At that time, Dorsey had been a scout for only a few years, but he was beginning to make his mark with one of the most talented personnel staffs ever assembled.

Although in Dorsey's eyes, this all almost never happened.

Soon after Wolf was hired in 1992, Dorsey remembers the first conversation they ever had. He was scouting at Rutgers and watching some film when he received a phone call.

"Some guy named Ron Wolf is on the phone for you," someone told Dorsey, as he recalled.

Dorsey thought he was getting fired.

"John, this is Ron Wolf calling, how are you doing?"

"I'm doing pretty good Mr. Wolf, how are you, sir?"

"Do you know how to work these computers?"

"Well, yes sir, I do."

"OK, good. Get on a plane, come back here and show me."

That was the first conversation between Dorsey and Wolf, and years later, the impact he would have on Dorsey's career and the careers of the other future NFL leaders in that room cannot be understated.

"I attempted to instill in each and every one of them how important it is to remember the guys that came before you," Wolf explained. "I was very fortunate that the people who came to work for me adapted to my style, and they really and truly did a tremendous job."

In 1992, Wolf hired head coach Mike Holmgren and traded for Brett Favre, then signed free agent defensive lineman Reggie White a year later in 1993, and it was those three moves that ultimately paved the way for his path to Canton and the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

If you ask Wolf, he'll be the first to tell you that all of their decisions were made as a group, and that one of his biggest accomplishments in Green Bay was surrounding himself with such talented and driven evaluators who weren't afraid to speak their mind.

"This is not their pick; this is not my pick," Wolf explained of his process. "It was our pick. It's a pick from the Green Bay Packers, and no one's feelings could get hurt."

"He was willing to teach you everything you wanted to learn depending on how far you wanted to take it," Dorsey explained of his mentor. "We learned decisiveness. We learned of the depth on how to build a team, how to work with coaches, how to build a draft board, how to communicate and make hard decisions.

"And ultimately, how to make the pieces work, and if they didn't work, how to find a solution to whatever lies ahead of you."

The respect was mutual between Dorsey and his mentor.

"If we needed an answer to a question, he would get that answer," Wolf recalled of Dorsey as a young scout. "He wouldn't quit until he had an answer or until we had a problem solved."

It's the work ethic driven by watching his father all those years back in Leonardtown manifesting itself decades later in the prism of a football team.

Dorsey recalled one night he was working late with Schneider before the 1995 NFL Draft, and it was about 5:00 p.m. when Wolf came to them with a task.

"I want that box done by tomorrow morning," Wolf said to them, pointing at a hanger box full of almost 600 VHS tapes.

It was going to be a late night.

"Schneider and I stayed there till 3:30 a.m., and we watched every tape," Dorsey recalled. "We found one player and we drafted him - running back Travis Jervey."

Jervey, who played collegiately at The Citadel, was selected by the Packers in the fifth round of the 1995 draft with the 170th overall pick. He made the Pro Bowl in 1997 as a standout special teams player and actually laid one of the first blocks that sprung Desmond Howard's 99-yard kickoff return touchdown late in the third quarter of the Super Bowl, which gave the Packers a 35-21 lead and ultimately sealed the victory.

Dorsey spent six years as a scout for the Packers before being promoted to director of college scouting in 1997. It's a position he held for only two years before leaving to join Holmgren in Seattle in the same role in 1999.

Dorsey returned to Green Bay after just one year.

At the time he was in Seattle, he had two young sons, Bryant and Austin, who were teenagers and would soon be entering high school.

"I thought it was important for them to have their father around," Dorsey explained, "so I decided to go back to Green Bay and make sure I saw those kids grow through their high school years."

Bryant is now a district attorney back in the Green Bay area, while Austin lives in the area as well and is a commercial and residential electrician.

"They love it there, and they've turned out to be really good young men," Dorsey explained of his two oldest sons. "So that makes me proud."

After Harlan retired in 2008, he always made it a point during the Packers home games to sit with the personnel staff because he really didn't feel like sitting with the executives.

"John always had a seat for me," Harlan explained. "He kind of took care of me."

When Dorsey first got permission to interview with the Chiefs after the 2013 season, which is one of only two jobs he always said he'd ever leave for, Harlan was one of the first people he called.

"I remember the first thing I said," Harlan recalled of that conversation. "I told him, 'It's a class organization that has a wonderful fan base. I've known the Hunt family for years and respect them tremendously. I think you've got to take it. I wouldn't hesitate for a second to tell you to take that job.'"

The opportunity to come to Kansas City also meant something to Dorsey's wife, Trish, who grew up in the small town of Abilene - which sits just an hour to the west of Manhattan.

Trish attended the University of Kansas and got her law degree from Washburn, and she continued working for a Kansas City-based law firm even when they were living in Green Bay.

"I was thrilled by the possibility of it, but I know football is a very complicated business," Trish, who remembers being in the kitchen at their home in Green Bay when John called and told her of the opportunity, explained. "And so, I was very excited but tried to keep my bearings about it. It just seemed impossible that all the stars would line up for us to come back."

Just a few days later, Dorsey called Harlan to give him the news.

"Quite honestly, I would have been disappointed if he hadn't taken it," Harlan recalled.

It wasn't the first offer Dorsey had to become a general manager, or even the second, but it was the one he was waiting for.

Wolf, who retired in 2001, has his handprints all over the NFL right now with five of his former protégés holding general manager positions, not to mention that his son, Eliot, is currently the director of football operations for the Packers.

"It means a great deal to me," Wolf explained of the success of those who worked for him. "You've got four of the five guys in the playoffs last year. There's no substitute for hard work, and they're enjoying the fruits of their labor now. Like I said, there's only so many of those jobs in the NFL, and five of them came from here.

"I'm very, very proud of that."

In Kansas City, Dorsey was able to reunite with a coach who had been with him in Green Bay for nine years (1992-99), Andy Reid.

"Back then, we were both in lower positions, about as low as you could be in both of our jobs when we first started off together," Reid recalled. "We've been able to last a little bit in this business, and so you'd hope you have the opportunity to be a GM, and you hoped to have a chance to be a head coach, so it's worked out for both of us."

From the beginning, Dorsey impressed those within the Chiefs organization.

"His enthusiasm for the opportunity came across even before that interview," Chiefs chairman and CEO Clark Hunt said at the time. "I had a chance to speak with him on the phone a couple days before that (interview), and he expressed how excited he was that I was reaching out to him. In his interview, although it went on for a while, he showed a high degree of enthusiasm the whole way.

"I know he has had chances to go other places, and for whatever reason, he decided not to, and I am thrilled that we were able to attract him to the Chiefs."

"It symbolizes everything I believe in," Dorsey explained of joining the Chiefs. "From the proud tradition, to the fan base, to the ownership. I mean, everything matched what I thought was important in professional football."

"The immediate impression, especially in that context, was that he's a football guy," Chiefs president Mark Donovan recalled of Dorsey's interview. "You can argue different approaches to what the GM has to handle, but he has a passion for it."

Those who had known Dorsey for a while, like his friend Hans Schaup from Green Bay, had no issues putting their money on the line knowing the kind of success Dorsey would have sooner rather than later.

"I became a Chiefs season ticket holder that April," Schaup explained. "[Dorsey] gave me the number to call, and now I have four seats right on the 30-yard line behind the Chiefs bench. That's how much confidence I have in [Dorsey] and Andy [Reid] turning around the ship."

In just a short time, Dorsey has taken the lessons he learned from Wolf, and just like Schneider in Seattle, McCloughlan in Washington, McKenzie in Oakland and Thompson in Green Bay, made them fit with the Chiefs.

"I think we tweak it to our strengths and weaknesses," Dorsey explained of his philosophy. "We all put our own stamp on it, but the blueprint is there. I've always said, 'We're 85 percent Atlanta Braves, and 15 percent Oakland Athletics.'

"Touch it, feel it, smell it - Braves. Analytics - Athletics."

Dorsey is more of an eye-test guy, and it has served him well throughout his career and particularly over the past couple of years overhauling a roster in Kansas City.

"I remember the first year, we had a lot of circles up on the board," Reid explained of the personnel staff he uses to analyze the roster. "This year, there aren't those 'circles,' so that's a good thing."

One of the most valuable lessons Dorsey learned while working for Wolf was that everything was in the details. That showed itself in many ways, particularly leading up to each NFL Draft.

As they would set their draft board each week, the scouts would have to take turns setting the board under the watchful and detailed eye of Wolf.

"[Wolf] would go down every team's board, and he would know every tag," Dorsey recalled. "If it was your week to do the board, God help you if you can't find those mistakes. Every week, once a week, he would come in there and find a mistake and go, 'I think so and so is not in there. I believe that number's wrong. I believe he ran a 4.48 not a 5.28.'"

It was an amazing display and goes to show you the level of detail Wolf had throughout his career, and it's a process Dorsey has kept for the next generation of potential general managers on his staff.

"We still try to adhere to that principle today with the young scouts," Dorsey explained. "And they'll tell you, we still do that. Jimmy Noel and Matt Donahoe, we still get them on that board."

Dorsey's right-hand man with the Chiefs is Chris Ballard, who left the Chicago Bears after 12 years in their personnel department to join Dorsey in Kansas City.

"I trusted him," Ballard, who first crossed paths with Dorsey while scouting at Louisiana Tech back in 2000, and then later on, when Dorsey helped organize the Hula Bowl, a college football showcase that ran for more than 60 years before ending in 2008, explained. "Especially just knowing a lot of the people I knew in Green Bay, knowing [Dorsey], and knowing what he stood for and what kind of man he was, it made it an easy decision."

Ballard, who is widely considered one of the top evaluators in the game as well, has learned plenty from his mentor over the past four years in Kansas City.

"I've learned from John that there's always a player out there and you've always got to continue to dig and look, and you can't be scared to bring that guy on your team," Ballard explained. "You've got to be aggressive. If you think this guy's better than somebody that you have, you've got to be willing to make the move. We're not drafting for our egos. We are drafting for the Chiefs and I've learned that from John.

"It doesn't matter what anybody else thinks. It only matters what we think in that room because at the end of the day it's the Chiefs' pick."

One of the most recent moves that's attributed with the success of the personnel staff was the decision to draft the NFL's reigning Defensive Player of the Year, cornerback Marcus Peters.

"One thing about [Dorsey] is he never makes it about him," Ballard explained. "It's about us. It's about that room - the coaches, the scouts, and all of us getting it right together. At the end of the day, that's what always stays. Even when he has a strong belief in a particular player, he wants to get everybody on board with it."

In the case of Peters, Dorsey wanted to get everyone on board.

"He absolutely, unequivocally wanted Peters," Ballard recalled of the work leading up to that draft. "I give him a lot of credit for that because everybody tried to poke holes in his steadfast belief that this kid was a good kid at heart and was going to be a great player for the Chiefs.

"And he was right - he was dead right."

After a Pro Bowl season and plenty of hardware and accolades for his rookie season, Peters' relationship with Dorsey is one of mutual respect.

"We understand each other," Peters explained of him and Dorsey. "When we need to talk, we talk, but I love him. He's a cool dude."

Whether it's hitting on a first-round pick or a slew of waiver-wire pickups, as was the case back in 2013 when the Chiefs picked up seven players after rosters were cut down to just 53 players, Dorsey showed you can build depth of talent in any number of ways.

Three of those seven players are still on the roster, and two of them, safety Ron Parker and defensive lineman Jaye Howard, are starters for a defense that's allowed the second-fewest points in the NFL over the past two years.

Both of those players have also earned multi-year contract extensions from Dorsey and the Chiefs.

"That was probably one of my most fun days in scouting," Ballard recalled of that waiver-wire period back in 2013. "I've never been a part of something where we had to claim so many players and found so many players."

Ballard has also learned from Dorsey how to deal with missing on a player.

"We might make a decision that we'll back away and have to move on from because it's not the best thing for the team in the long run, and that stings every once in a while, all of us," Ballard added. "I mean, we're going to have players that we don't get right, but at the end of the day, we're going to find the right players for the Chiefs, and [Dorsey's] outstanding at that."

Dorsey often describes himself as an "eternal optimist," which is an apt description for a man who had his fair share of blue-collar jobs growing up, and he's taken that same attitude to what many would consider a job that's far from blue collar.

"The one thing I don't think people realize is, those years in the trenches, those years scouting on his own in a rental car in the backwoods of Mississippi or Georgia, or wherever, trying to do the extra piece of research on a certain player," Donovan explained. "The work he put in and his understanding of how important that work is, that little detail, which says, that's why you don't draft that guy, or that's why you do draft that guy - those are his best stories."

Getting that blue-collar attitude out of Dorsey is easier said than done.

"We had to deal with it this offseason," Donovan laughed. "He's a general manager now, and to start taking off and going to some back neighborhood to talk to friends of a potential player may not be what he needs to do right now.

"He's still trying to do the things that he used to do as a scout because he knows the importance of the little details."

In the world of professional football, which is often portrayed as anything but honest and forthcoming, Dorsey's reputation, described as "flawless" by NFL super-agent, Tom Condon, stretches across the spectrum of people he's worked with over the years.

"If he tells you something is blue today, it's going to be blue tomorrow," Tony Paige, the executive vice president of football for Perennial Sports and Entertainment, said. "It won't be blue today and green tomorrow. He's a straight shooter - always has been."

Paige played nine years in the NFL and first became friends with Dorsey when he was a fullback for the Detroit Lions at the same time Dorsey was playing with the division-rival Packers.

"He's one of the best and most talented evaluators I've ever known," Paige added. "I've been an agent for more than 20 years and in this league for more than 30, so I've got a lot of respect for the guy.

"Nobody watches more film than him."

Beyond the film room, Dorsey has earned his reputation by being genuine with people, regardless of whether they're interns during training camp or parishioners at his church.

"He's really concerned about the character and giving people a chance," Bishop Bob Morneau of the Resurrection Church of Green Bay, explained of Dorsey, whom he'd grown close with all those years Dorsey and his family lived in Green Bay.

Morneau remembers watching Dorsey chase around his two youngest children, Jack and Catherine, in the narthex during mass on Sundays because as Morneau said, "they were a little rambunctious" and had to step out.

"I just remember how attentive he was to the children and how loving," Morneau recalled, "and then I was just impressed with his character. He's always been a gracious man - a man of great moral character."

To this day, Dorsey considers Morneau one of the most influential people in his life, and he'll call and ask for a prayer from Morneau for the players heading into a big weekend, and it's never about winning, but rather about keeping them safe.

When the Chiefs played in Green Bay over the last two years, Dorsey invited Morneau to the team hotel to offer a church service for any players who wanted to attend.

Dorsey's faith is important to him.

"He has an appreciation for their life outside of just football," Morneau explained. "He trusts in a person and their families and their interests. He has a real sense of human dignity and these individuals are persons, not just football players."

One example of this taking place was with former Packers linebacker Jamari Lattimore, who signed with the team as an undrafted free agent linebacker out of Middle Tennessee State back in 2011.

Lattimore's agent - Tony Agnone of Eastern Athletic Services - has known Dorsey for more than three decades because he actually tried signing him as a client when he was coming out of college. Agnone explained that Lattimore wasn't ready for a lot of things coming into the NFL.

"[Dorsey] did everything he could to help him," Agnone recalled. "He helped him get a car and even helped him get a sport coat. He helped get his apartment taken care of. I mean, John personally did that. That is the kind of thing that you don't really see much in the NFL right now.

"That's really kind of an old school thing."

Agnone and Dorsey have a streak going at the Senior Bowl in Mobile, Alabama, going back a couple of decades in which they make sure to find one day to eat breakfast together every year.

One of Dorsey's favorite sayings is, "God created two ears and one mouth," which is fitting for the way he has developed his reputation around the league.

"I think what a lot of people don't understand is how much of a relationship business the business of football really is," Rick Smith, a partner at Priority Sports and Entertainment, explained. "The guys who understand that happen to get a lot of things done, and guys who don't, struggle.

"Dorsey understood that right away. He listens to you. He calls you back and hears what you have to say, and he'll change his mind if he hears something a little different than what he's thinking that makes more sense to him. He's just great that way, and I think that certain transactions happen in Kansas City because of those relationships.

"I think all things being equal, you tend to want to do business with guys that allow you to do your job, and [Dorsey] gives that probably more than anybody in this business."

It's something Dorsey was taught as a kid, and it stuck with him.

"There's five people you meet through life's journey who make an impact on your life," he explained.

Outside of his family, obviously, Dorsey said he's already identified four of those people in his life - starting with Robert "Red" Pulliam from Fork Union, continuing with Harlan, Wolf and Morneau in Green Bay.

Those are the non-family members who have had the biggest influence on who and where Dorsey is today, and beyond that, there's simply a deep appreciation and love for the game of football.

"When you talk to John about football, you can't get away with just talking about the season," Trish explained. "You have to be really well-versed in the history of it. As the game has become so much more commercial and so much more pop culture, he's grown with that, but he's never lost sight of the history."

Whether its quizzing interns during training camp about current and former NFL players, or maintaining old friendships that lead to moves which could hopefully bring the Lombardi Trophy back to Kansas City, Dorsey has done things the right way through his tenure so far.

"What he's best at is what's most valuable to this organization - building a team, evaluating talent, putting people in the right places and working with a coach," Donovan explained. "If you asked him, I'd assume that would be his answer, too.

"He's learning all of the other things - with the media and business stuff that we make him do, that's a part of it and it's important, but at the end of the day, what we want him to be the very best at is what he is the very best at."

Through it all, Dorsey has never forgotten where he came from.

"Everybody that has been a part of his life, he's still much entwined with and keeps in touch with," Ron Jensen, a friend back in Leonardtown, explained. "He's never forgotten anybody. You don't find that a lot of times once people become very successful."

Dorsey is the same guy who spent much of his childhood in the emergency room because he was always exploring things outside, and who still finds time to email back his old babysitter, Jan Norris, who lived next door to his parents growing up and who sends him the positions she thinks the Chiefs should focus on in the upcoming draft.

She jokingly takes credit for the Chiefs first pick being a defensive lineman in former Mississippi State Bulldog Chris Jones.

On a deeper level, Dorsey provides items each year for an auction back in his hometown in honor of his friend's daughter, Jenna Stone, who tragically passed away three years ago.

The "Jenna Stone Memorial Golf Tournament" and auction raises money for an activity fund at the local high school, St. Mary's Ryken.

"John Michael never ever misses sending something," Joe Stone, Jenna's dad, who gets "Happy Father's Day" cards from Dorsey "out of the blue," Stone explained. "It just means so much to me."

That's the Dorsey they all know back in Leonardtown, and when asked about remembering longtime friends with those types of gestures, Dorsey would rather not make a big deal out of it, saying, "Those are just the things you do in life."

Those are just the things he does in life, just like the quizzes he hands out to staff members for fun or the sport coats he gets for players who need the help. There's a genuine love and respect for people underneath it all for Dorsey.

"We tend to complicate life," Dorsey explained. "You treat people the way you want to be treated, and communicate. It's pretty easy."

Eric Berry named NFL's Comeback Player of the Year

SAN FRANCISCO -- Eric Berry's return from Hodgkin's lymphoma was, in the eyes of many, the best story in football this season. The Associated Press agrees, naming the Kansas City Chiefs safety their Comeback Player of the Year at NFL Honors on Saturday.

"There were some tough times. There were times I felt like I couldn't do it anymore," Berry said in his acceptance speech. "There were times of uncertainty. ... There were a lot of lonely nights but my mom was right there. ... When I lost my hair, (my dad) shaved his head so I wouldn't be by myself and I love you to death for that."

Berry added, "I knew I would be here, but I feel like I'm dreaming right now."

After leaving the team late in 2014 to battle his illness, Berry roared back in 2015 to earn his fourth Pro Bowl selection and second first-team All-Pro nod, looking as good as ever for a Chiefs defense that surged down the stretch during Kansas City's heady 11-game win streak.

"Oh man, it was terrifying at first," Berry told NFL Media's Alex Flanagan on Thursday's edition of Super Bowl Live. "Just hearing 'You have cancer' -- it was tough. But I had a great support system."

Berry told Flanagan that he never considered walking away from the game, saying: "That wasn't even my focus. My focus at first was just getting healthy and getting back to E.B., being able to have a normal day. Then I just started seeing progress. And I was like, 'Man, I'm going to get back on the field.'"

Berry dominated the race for Comeback honors, netting 38 of the 50 votes. Cardinals quarterback Carson Palmer finished second with six votes ahead of Vikings running back Adrian Peterson with four. San Francisco linebacker NaVorro Bowman and Bucs running back Doug Martin each grabbed a solo vote.

At 27, Berry still has plenty of time left to add to his legacy as one of the league's top safeties. The Chiefs plan to keep him around, too, with NFL Media Insider Ian Rapoport reporting that Kansas City is ramping up talks on a new contract for the soon-to-be free agent.

That's business for another time. Today we can celebrate what Berry has accomplished.

Chiefs' Marcus Peters named NFL's defensive rookie of the year

SAN FRANCISCO – Talk about a dream scenario.

No one represents his city more than Chiefs cornerback Marcus Peters, a proud Oakland native. So really, what better place to receive the NFL defensive rookie of the year award — which he was awarded Saturday night during the league's NFL Honors program — than San Francisco, which is a short drive across the Bay Bridge.

“It means a lot, you know,” Peters said. “It shows all my hard work and trusting and sacrificing that I had to do to get to this point. It's been a hell of a year for me, to turn around and think back last year around this time, what I was going through.”

The honor caps a remarkable season for Peters, who was dismissed from Washington during his redshirt junior year for repeating disagreements with the coaching staff but was still taken by the Chiefs with the 18th overall pick in the 2015 NFL Draft.

“All it was was just me and my family and a dark tunnel — we always believed we could get to this point because my confidence in myself was never going to change at all, so everything else around me, I just needed to tight up a little bit,” Peters said.

Chiefs cornerback Marcus Peters examines the many reasons he's happy and grateful to be named the NFL's defensive rookie of the year.

On the season, Peters added a dash of playmaking to a secondary that desperately needed it. He tied for the league lead in interceptions with eight, and led the league in passes defensed with 26.

He and second-round pick Mitch Morse, who started 15 games at center, represented a respectable haul in last year's draft, something Peters wasn't shy about pointing out Saturday.

“The Chiefs stole the draft last year,” Peters said. “I knew I was the best defensive player going into last year's draft. My demeanor ... even when I'm just hanging around my teammates, it just comes off a little strong. And my mom, she tells me all the time that I need to soften it up a little bit.

“But that's the grind, that's the grind that I get from Oakland. It teaches me to make sure I keep my core solid and trust and believe in family.”

Peters helped the Chiefs, who tied for last in the league in interceptions last season with six, increase that number to 22, the second-most in the league. He also returned two interceptions for scores and finished with 60 tackles.

Chiefs LB Derrick Johnson: “I want to be a part of it”

BJ Kissel

March 14, 2016

The veteran linebacker’s heart was always in Kansas City.

“We aren’t going to let good football players go.”

That’s what Kansas City Chiefs general manager John Dorsey said a few weeks ago at the NFL Scouting Combine when asked if they were going to bring back veteran linebacker Derrick Johnson, who was scheduled to become a free agent when the new league year began.

Johnson, who is the franchise’s all-time leading tackler and who has been one of the most beloved players in the community since he joined the Chiefs back in 2005 as the team’s first-round pick (No. 15 overall) out of the University of Texas, didn’t give leaving much thought.

“There wasn’t a doubt,” Johnson said of whether or not he’d be returning to the Chiefs, despite outside interest from other teams.

Johnson had said all along that he wanted to come back, and he wasn’t the only member of the defense to re-sign with the team last week.

Both veteran linebacker Tamba Hali and defensive lineman Jaye Howard signed multi-year contracts to stay as well.

“The chemistry we have, that’s very important,” Johnson explained. “We’re a close-knit group. You don’t want to break that up. [John Dorsey] and the organization, they made sure they kept the nucleus of the defense together.

“I was happy to see my brother Tamba [Hali] get his contract done.”

In fact, Johnson and Hali had been communicating with each other over the offseason, trying to make sure they were going to keep this group together.

When Hali signed his extension, Johnson was among the first to reach out to him.

“It was one of those old friend moments,” Johnson recalled, “and I told him, ‘Hey, whatever I have to do, we’ll work together to get this done.’”

“At first, [Hali] was a little worried because it was getting down to the wire, but the old man hadn’t left him yet,” he laughed.

Johnson and Hali will forever be connected as they were the team’s first-round picks in back-to-back years—2005 and 2006. They have 10 Pro Bowls between them and have seen the ups and downs—good seasons and bad—and those experiences created a bond they weren’t going to break.

They helped lead a defense which allowed just 12.1 points per game during the final 13 contests of 2015, a mark that led them to a franchise-record 10 consecutive wins and their first playoff victory in more than two decades.

The defense was the catalyst for last season's turnaround from a 1-5 start, all the way to the best season for the franchise since "The Sandlot" was one of the top movies at the box office.

"The last two years, we've beaten the Super Bowl champions," Johnson added.

In Week 4 of the 2014 season, the Chiefs beat the New England Patriots by a score of 41-14 on Monday Night Football at Arrowhead Stadium. The Patriots would go on to win the Super Bowl. In Week 10 of this past season, the Chiefs beat the Denver Broncos, 29-13, and they would also go on to win the Super Bowl.

"You've got to beat them at the right time," Johnson added, "but I think we're very close. We're not one of those rebuilding teams. We're a team that's going to be in the thick of it at the end of the day."

Individually, Johnson rebounded from a ruptured Achilles suffered in Week 1 of the 2014 season to be named a second-team All-Pro last year by leading the team with 116 tackles, also picking up 4 sacks, 2 forced fumbles and 2 interceptions.

"I wasn't surprised," Johnson said of the level he played at in 2015. "I expected it, but sometimes I sit back in bed like, man, I'm checking my Achilles, checking certain things like man, it's this really happening right now?"

"I'm back. I'm really back to form, and that's a blessing, man.

"Much to the surprise of those who don't know him very well, Johnson did regain that form and was Pro Football Focus' No. 8-ranked linebacker in 2015.

"He's athletic. He's instinctive. He never has to leave the field," Dorsey noted of Johnson. "He's 33 years old, but he didn't play like a 33-year old (last season).

"There's still some juice left in that guy."

After 11 seasons with the team, Johnson understands the position he's in and how close this organization is to grabbing something special.

"I've had some ups and downs," Johnson said of his career with the Chiefs. "I've been through three general managers, five head coaches, but the best is yet to come. We're still chomping at the bit trying to get this ring. That's the main thing—to win the Lombardi trophy and get a Super Bowl win.

"[Tamba and I] will keep going at it until we get it."

When it comes to his legacy, Johnson is aware of what he's accomplished, but not focused on it.

"When I retire, I'll think about it even more," he said. "I'm at an age that I know I can't play another 10 years. Signing this three-year deal, it just assures that I can help this team win. That's all I want to do, be a part of this great legacy that's about to go on now.

“Andy [Reid] has been here for three years and his record shows what he’s trying to build here, and I want to be a part of it.”

Johnson is doing far more than just being a part of it—he’s leading the charge, which is right where he belongs.

Chiefs' expensive acquisition of Mitchell Schwartz makes sense in AFC West

Terez Paylor
Kansas City Star
March 25, 2016

The left tackle position has long been considered the most important one on the offensive line. The protector of the quarterback's blindside, he's the one who often blocks the league's best edge rushers.

But in the Chiefs' division, the AFC West, the right tackle spot might be just as important. Four of the league's best edge rushers — Denver's Von Miller, Oakland's Khalil Mack, Kansas City's Justin Houston and San Diego's Melvin Ingram — each rush off that side, meaning there's no place for lumbering, predominant-run blocking right tackles in this division.

That is, to be sure, one of the reasons the Chiefs felt comfortable giving former Cleveland Browns right tackle Mitchell Schwartz a lucrative five-year deal worth $33 million during free agency. That is the most guaranteed money being paid to a veteran right tackle, according to J.I. Halsell, a former Washington cap analyst who runs NFLContractMetrics.com.

With left tackle Eric Fisher said to have a cap number of $7 million in 2016, the Chiefs have a lot of money tied up in the position this year, but Chiefs coach Andy Reid thinks it's worth it.

"(It's) huge," Reid said on a recent conference call. "You want to make sure you're secure on the edge and at the same time, give the quarterback an opportunity to step up when he needs to with a firm inside three. Having two tackles, particularly in this division, ends up being very important."

Reid isn't the only coach who feels this way. Two of the coaches who face the Chiefs twice a year in the AFC West — Oakland's Jack Del Rio and San Diego's Mike McCoy — spoke this week at the NFL's annual meetings about the importance of having a right tackle who can pass protect.

"You better have good linemen and you better have good design, because there's a lot of great pass rushers in this division," Del Rio said. "And it starts with the Super Bowl MVP. Von is a special, special guy off the edge, and I think Khalil has a chance to be that. That's part of surviving in our division — you better get ready to block those guys."

McCoy agreed.

"It's critical (to have two), because that's what we see week-in and week-out in our division, teams that have two (good) guys coming off the edge," McCoy said. "... Anytime you can add a good tackle to your roster, facing the type of rushers we have, it's critical to your passing game."

Schwartz seems to fit the bill. The AFC North coaches who faced him twice a year since 2012 — Pittsburgh's Mike Tomlin, Baltimore's John Harbaugh and Cincinnati's Marvin Lewis — all spoke highly of him this week.

"Big, strong, good rangy right tackle," Harbaugh said. "Very physical, very smart player. I would see that he'd be Andy Reid's kind of guy. Seems like a smart, tough, great competitor."

Tomlin agreed.

“I thought he was a solid, starter-capable right tackle,” Tomlin said. “He’s available. He’s got durability. I don’t know he missed any game that we were scheduled to play against him. I think he’s a good player.”

Lewis concurred as well. “I think he’s been a hard-working guy,” said Lewis.

Lewis’ former offensive coordinator, Hue Jackson, is now the head coach of the Browns, who lost Schwartz to the Chiefs in free agency.

“We’d love to bring all of our players back, but it didn’t work that way,” Jackson said. “He’s a Kansas City Chief now, so we need to leave it at that.”

The Browns’ pain is the Chiefs’ gain. Schwartz figures to be a plug-and-play option at right tackle for a Chiefs team that surrendered 46 sacks in 2015 (tied for the sixth-most in the league). His pass-blocking grade of 86.8 in 2015 was the seventh-best mark in the league, and second-best among right tackles.

Schwartz’s presence also allows the Chiefs’ 2015 starter at right tackle, Jah Reid, to shift down to a guard position, where he was more impressive in limited action last season.

During a conference call with reporters, Schwartz made it clear that he takes pride in his durability — the former second-round pick hasn’t missed a snap in four seasons — and pass protection, as he often uses his superb balance and technique to corral dangerous edge rushers.

“I’ve always been big on technique — that was engrained in me in college by my offensive line coach, Jim Michalczyk at the time,” Schwartz said. “He was huge on technique, and technique kind of overcomes all the other things. You need to be strong, you need to be athletic, you need to be fast, (but) having good technique makes you a solid player.

“And then if you add the speed and the strength on top of that, it can make you into a pretty good player.”

Good technique is important, he said, because in the heat of battle against elite athletes like Miller and Mack, one has to largely rely on instincts.

“You’re not thinking about too much, you just have to react to things, and by that point, it’s all muscle memory — you have to have a good foundation for what you’re doing,” Schwartz said. “That’s how you get good at anything, you just have to practice it over and over and keep striving for perfection.”

When it comes to the latter, Schwartz said he learned a ton by flanking star left tackle Joe Thomas — a nine-time Pro Bowler and likely future Hall of Famer — for the last four years.

“I couldn’t have had a better player to go with,” Schwartz said. “And then he turned out to be a great guy and a great friend to me, as well, to help me out.”

Schwartz’s durability and skills in pass protection aren’t the only things he’s got going for him. Reid confirmed this week that Schwartz, a former college left tackle, could slide to the left side in a pinch.

“Yeah, I think he probably could play anywhere along the line,” Reid said. “He’s highly intelligent, not only in the books, but also football-wise. I think we could probably swing him wherever, left tackle included, if needed.”

However, Reid also made it clear that the expectation is that Schwartz and Fisher will form a strong pass-blocking tandem in an elite pass-rush division. That's what he was signed for.

"Fish (Eric Fisher) did a good job for us, so that would be more of an injury thing than anything," Reid said.

"Listen, we know the Schwartz family, we had Geoff here, and we appreciated his time here. He helped get us started in our first year here. His brother is similar, he's very durable and very intelligent and a hard worker. We like all of those things. Knock on wood, I'm not sure he's missed a game, he's reliable there. And reliability ends up being an important thing in this league.

Chiefs' Andy Reid is the guy Nick Foles wanted to play for

Adam Teicher
ESPN

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. -- To get his career back on the track it was on a couple years ago, quarterback Nick Foles believed there was only one place he could go, one coach he could play for.

That's why Foles, in a way, returned to his NFL roots by signing with the Kansas City Chiefs. His NFL career began in 2012, when he played one season for current Chiefs head coach Andy Reid, who was then coaching the Philadelphia Eagles.

"After we got the release done with the Rams ... we had some time to think about everything," said Foles, who practiced with the Chiefs for the first time at training camp on Friday. "It was always going to be an opportunity to be around someone I just respect and love. Coach Reid was the guy who drafted me as a rookie. He was a guy I always stayed in touch with, always thought the world of. As I sort of stepped away from the game for those few days, I was able to talk to him about how I felt and we just went through it.

"It was really only [about] coach Reid. I didn't care about any other offer. I told me agent, 'That's the guy I want to play for.'"

Foles was the third-team quarterback in practice Friday behind starter Alex Smith and backup Tyler Bray.

Reid and the Eagles drafted Foles in the third round in 2012, and his career got off to a promising start that year. Foles started six games as a rookie and though the Eagles won only one of them, he finished the season with more touchdown passes (six) than interceptions (five).

Reid, fired by the Eagles after the 2012 season, joined the Chiefs the next season. Foles' career hit its high point in that 2013 season. He threw 27 touchdown passes and only two interceptions for the Eagles, by then coached by Chip Kelly.

But he gave some credit to the lessons he learned under Reid for the success he had that year.

"That's a great guy to play for," Foles said. "I'm blessed to have the opportunity to be back with him.

"He got out of me more than I ever thought possible. He pushed me to every throw, everything I did, to just be aggressive. He really helped me become the player [I became] the next year."

Chiefs wide receiver Jeremy Maclin played a couple of seasons with Foles for the Eagles. He said he wasn't surprised that Foles opted to play again for Reid, which Maclin himself did last year.

“It goes to show the type of respect people who play for coach Reid have for him and the kind of faith they have in him,” Maclin said. “Any time Big Red wants you to be a part of what he has going on, that’s an honor. It didn’t surprise me that this would be a spot that he’d pick.”

Hali escaped the country amid a civil war in the '90s

A major part of Kansas City Chiefs veteran linebacker Tamba Hali's story is how he escaped from Liberia in 1992 amid a deadly civil war in the country.

Over the weekend, Hali began taking to social media to document his first trip to his native country for the first time in 24 years.

"Reunited with my family in Liberia. Haven't been back since 1992!"

"Speaking to the youth after a quick swim."

"The house I grew up in before we had to flee the country during the Liberian Civil War."

"The river we caught our fish in."

"It was a pleasure to see and talk with the President of Liberia, Madam Ellen Johnson."

Jeremy Maclin Honored with Distinguished American Award

Chiefs receiver and University of Missouri grad Jeremy Maclin was honored with the Don Faurot “Distinguished American” Award at the National Football Foundation and College Hall of Fame Inc. 24th Annual Awards Banquet this week.

The award is one of the highest honors awarded to MU alumni and is named in honor of the late University of Missouri legend Don Faurot, inventor of the notorious University of Missouri Split-T offensive formation first used in the 1941 season. The formation helped the Tigers to win all but one match that season.

Unavailable for the event, Maclin’s family accepted the award on his behalf.

“It means a lot to be that recipient of that award from just a prestigious man and what he's done for football throughout the state of Missouri,” Maclin said. “Unfortunately I couldn't attend, but my family was there and represented me well.”

Jeremy wasn't the only Maclin to receive an honor that evening. His younger cousin, Jarius Maclin, received the same award Jeremy received years prior: a class scholarship award recognizing excellence on the field and in the classroom.

“I remember back when I was a little kid, I also went to that same award banquet and also received the same award my little cousin got. So for them to double back and keep me in mind, and just recognize me for what I've done is pretty cool,” Maclin added.

Established in 1966, the Distinguished American Award recognizes outstanding candidates who have exhibited leadership qualities and made significant contributions to the betterment of amateur football in the United States.

Tamba Hali Continues to Exemplify Special Leadership Traits

Hali has been benevolent with his time throughout OTAs for the Chiefs

After 11 seasons in the NFL and currently ranking second in Kansas City Chiefs franchise history with 86 career sacks, Tamba Hali has earned his place as one of the best defensive players to ever step foot on the field at Arrowhead Stadium.

We've come to know it as "Tamba Time."

Beginning with the dreads and visor back in the day, Hali's relentless pursuit of opposing quarterbacks over the years has defined the man who steps between the lines every Sunday in the fall, but it's the man who has spent the last two weeks at OTAs dedicating his time to the younger players that defines the character of a truly special individual.

"He's all about the team," Chiefs coach Andy Reid explained of Hali. "He has been that way since I've been here and I'm sure he was that way before I got here. I love his attitude. He's all about the Chiefs and we're glad to have him here for everything that he does besides being a great football player."

After undergoing offseason knee surgery, Hali hasn't participated in OTAs, but that hasn't kept him away from the field. He's out there every day working off to the side with his younger teammates, passing his extensive knowledge to help the next generation of "Sack City" be ready to take over when the time comes.

Hali doesn't have to be out there. He's doing this on his own time, which could be spent doing literally anything else.

With his pedigree and prominent place in franchise history, Hali has every reason to take time off and only focus on rehabbing his knee and relaxing. Nobody would bat an eye if that's what he decided to do, but the deep intrinsic leadership qualities he possesses won't keep him away from the field.

"If there's ever a definition of all in, he's all in," defensive coordinator Bob Sutton explained of Hali. "Every day, every way, and that's a great thing for us on defense. It's a great thing for our team because one of your premier players has that kind of attitude and he's doing whatever he can do, which is limited right now, but he's doing it and that's all you can ask anybody."

Hali said earlier this offseason that his rehab has been going well and that he's progressing on schedule.

Whether he's producing on the field or working with guys off to the side, Hali continues to show special leadership traits.

Derrick Johnson Raised $110,000 At This Year's Celebrity Waiter Night

It was the fourth annual event benefiting Johnson's Defend the Dream Foundation

Kansas City Chiefs all-time leading tackler Derrick Johnson hosted his fourth annual "Celebrity Waiter Night" benefiting his Defend the Dream Foundation at the Grand Street Café in Kansas City, Missouri, on Monday night. In total, the evening raised $110,000 on the evening.

Johnson and 14 of his teammates, including Dontari Poe, Alex Smith, Charcandrick West, among others, served as actual waiters for the guests in attendance on a night that included a silent auction, a live auction and other games.

"Man it's awesome," Johnson said. "Celebrity Waiter Night caters to any inner-city kids through education and it's all about giving back and giving the core values that I grew up on. That's making sure education is important, having a good attitude and always doing you best."

The foundation uses the funds raised at Waiter Night for two main initiatives—DJ's Discovery Dens and Gearing Up! Together. According to Defend the Dream, these programs have resulted in nine reading oases containing 10,800 age appropriate books, and 300 kids receiving school supplies before heading back to school.

"The Voice of the Chiefs," Mitch Holthus, played host to the evening's events for the fourth consecutive year.

"The cause is awesome," Holthus said. "Derrick has such a heart for education with his mom being a career educator and he has made an impact in Kansas City building his reading labs and specifically for schools that need it the most.

"We continue to talk about funding for schools in all places throughout the Chiefs Kingdom, but Derrick makes it real. The work he has done particularly for the inner-city reading areas and reading labs, so that the Defend the Dream Foundation is profound."

Newcomer to Kansas City, offensive lineman Mitch Schwartz, shared Holthus' feelings on the event.

"Any time you can go out and help kids, help individuals that need it, it's a really good opportunity," Schwartz said. "It's really cool to see people who take the initiative and I know a lot of people like to help, want to help, but to actually go out and do it and start something like that, it shows a lot of commitment on his part."

During the event, Dr. Anthony Lewis, the director of elementary education for Kansas City Public Schools, spoke to just how effective the program has become, specifically citing examples of two children he has seen positively impacted firsthand.

Eric Berry wins George Halas Award

June 20, 2016

Kansas City Chiefs safety Eric Berry has won the George Halas Award for overcoming adversity to succeed.

The Professional Football Writers of America honored Berry on Monday. Berry, the AP's Comeback Player of the Year, overcame a diagnosis of Hodgkin lymphoma in late 2014 to return to the field and have an All-Pro season in 2015.

The 47th Halas Award winner, Berry is the first member of the Chiefs to receive the honor. He underwent six rounds of chemotherapy treatment from Dec. 10, 2014 until May 13, 2015. Berry was declared cancer free last June 22, and he was on the field for the first training camp practice July 29.

Berry returned to the starting lineup in Week 2, was third on the team with 61 tackles (55 solo) and had a pair of interceptions.

Offseason workouts with Jeremy Maclin pay off for Chiefs' Chris Conley and Albert Wilson

Terez Paylor
Kansas City Star
June 27, 2016

On one late afternoon last February, Chris Conley was feeling pretty good about himself when his cell phone buzzed.

Conley had just completed his rookie season with the Chiefs. He planned to spend the offseason working out at the University of Georgia, his alma mater. He had just moved into a short-term apartment in Atlanta.

Little did he know that plan would quickly be turned on its head.

"Chris!" Jeremy Maclin said on the other end. "What are you doing?"

"Nothing," Conley replied.

Maclin planned to work out at the Chiefs' training facility in the offseason. He told Conley that if he really wanted to be a great wide receiver, he'd get on a flight to Kansas City.

"He was like 'You're coming back,'" Conley said.

Conley didn't have a place to live in Kansas City, but Maclin offered to let him stay in his home. The decision was simple.

"If that guy calls you," Conley remembers his father saying, "you don't tell him no."

So that's how the 23-year-old Conley came to live this offseason with Maclin, the Chiefs' 28-year-old No. 1 receiver.

Over the next month and a half, the two of them and 23-year-old receiver Albert Wilson lifted weights, watched film and worked on route concepts four days a week until the Chiefs' offseason workout program began April 18.

"When Mac told me he was definitely (going to) be here, there was no hesitation for me coming back," said Wilson, a Georgia State grad who had also planned to spend the offseason working out in Atlanta until Maclin reached out.

In retrospect, it looks like Conley (the Chiefs' No. 3 receiver in 2015) and Wilson (No. 2 in 2015) made wise decisions. Veteran free agent Rod Streater and rookie Tyreek Hill made a strong push during organized team activities, but Conley and Wilson held on to their positions.

"Those are a couple of guys that I thought had good camps — they're kind of growing up before our eyes here, which is fun to watch," Chiefs coach Andy Reid said. "I think I'd tell you yes, that both of them working with Maclin paid off."

A typical offseason day for Maclin, Conley and Wilson started about 9 a.m. at the training facility. They ate breakfast, got in the weight room, then ran on the field. Then they'd go in the film room or practice footwork.

"I think it's my job to help them, and to help them understand that 'Hey, these are the things I do to get myself ready,'" said Maclin, who caught 87 passes for 1,088 yards and eight touchdowns in 2015, his first year in Kansas City. "I'm not necessarily saying this is what you have to do, but you can take bits and pieces and physically get yourself ready."

And the first thing Maclin wanted them to see is how to work smarter in the offseason, not necessarily harder.

"Conley's a guy who likes to go, go, go, go," Maclin said. "The things he was doing didn't necessarily need to be done. It was the time where you get your body back right. You take mental notes. Running 30, 35, 40 routes a day isn't really necessary in late February, early March."

Maclin learned to use his time in different ways.

"Maybe on a Saturday, (Jeremy) would say 'I'm gonna watch film, ya'll don't have to come,'" Wilson said with a laugh. "And (he'd) see if we show up, to see how serious we were about things. And of course, we both showed up every chance we got."

Like Reid, quarterback Alex Smith can see how Maclin's influence has rubbed off on Conley and Wilson.

"I think one (way) is the attention to detail, how much (Jeremy) thinks about little things, asking questions in installation," Smith said. "And then the route running, all that, the work ethic, how he attacks guys and things like that."

Conley, like Wilson, needs to show continued improvement once the pads come on in July. But Smith was impressed with how Conley — a 6-foot-2, 205-pounder who ran a blistering 4.35-second 40-yard dash at the 2015 NFL Scouting Combine — has grown comfortable using his athletic gifts to beat defensive backs.

Conley says watching Maclin helped him fine-tune his footwork and body control, in particular.

"For me, being a bigger guy — a guy who typically runs 100 miles an hour — it's hard for me to stop on a dime and make sharper cuts," Conley said. "It was really working on that, fine-tuning those cuts to where they were effective at getting someone moved off their spot."

Wilson, meanwhile, is still learning how to set defenders up and needs to do a better job of making tough catches, but the 5-foot-9, 200-pounder is good with the ball in his hands, which is why he saw plenty of time in the slot during offseason workouts and seemed to get stronger as camp went on.

"That's been a new role for him," Smith said. "That's a big plate there when you move inside, that's a lot on your shoulders — especially mentally — and he's handled it. Been good there, too."

Wilson said he also closely watched Maclin's route running in addition to how he conducts himself on the field.

"From the way he runs his routes, to the attitude that should be displayed on the field, he's just a flat-out leader, more by his performance than his words," Wilson said.

Conley said that when Maclin does speak, he can be direct, but he added their time together helped the three become more honest with each other, which allows them to be critical when necessary.

“We’re on a level where he knows if there’s something I’ve done that’s not right, he can tell me, and he’s not going to be shy about saying it,” Conley said. “He might say it in front of everybody, he might pull me aside and say it. He doesn’t really pull punches. He’s a blunt guy, but especially with me — he’ll take it to another level with me because he has expectations.

“But at the same time, he knows what I expect of him — so he knows that I’ll say things to him as well, so we have this respect for each other now that’s different.”

Maclin agreed.

“It’s a big brother-little brother relationship, but it’s a respect,” Maclin said. “It’s not like I think they’re better than me or vice versa. I’m only 28.”

And for that, Conley and Wilson are both thankful.

“I learned a ton, and I’m thankful for that, that he would take the time to allow me into his home and really just be coaching me on not just football, but a football life, every day,” Conley said.

“I know that I have a great opportunity,” said Wilson, who will be a free agent in two seasons. “I’m in a great situation to really take care of myself for a long time.”

Brazilian athletes in KC set to watch Olympics with fingers crossed

The world will be watching the Olympics in Brazil, with the Opening Ceremony set for Friday. Chiefs place kicker Cairo Santos hopes they see the best of his homeland, but wonders if that will be the case.

“I’m anxious to see how the thing is going to play out,” Santos said. “I’m more anxious than excited.”

News reports leading to the Games in Rio de Janeiro have focused on negative topics: the polluted beaches and waterways, the Zika virus, and on Thursday hundreds of demonstrators angry at the high cost of hosting the Games. They protested as the Olympic torch passed through the city on its way to the Opening Ceremony.

Police used pepper spray to disperse the crowd.

In June, the state government announced a “state of public calamity” regarding its financial crisis in preparation for the Games

In Kansas City, professional athletes from Brazil — the Chiefs, Royals and Sporting KC are represented — await the Olympics with unease.

“It does bother me because I think we disappointed a lot of people (with) the way that we organized it,” said Paulo Nagamura, a Sporting KC midfielder since 2011. “I’m just saying that based on the things we see in the media.”

Nagamura, Santos and Royals outfielder Paulo Orlando are from Sao Paulo, Brazil’s largest city, some 270 miles west of Rio. Santos spent three weeks in Brazil before training camp began and heard daily about the problems.

“It was the vibe you got,” Santos said. “The nation wants to pull off a beautiful event, one that will go smoothly for everybody.”

A majority of Brazilians believe that will happen according to a survey. The study by Brazilian think tank FGV conducted over the final two weeks of May suggested more than two-thirds of people living in Rio were optimistic about the Games.

The hospitality industry — hotels, restaurants, bars and tourist attractions — got the highest marks. Transportation didn’t fare as well. Some 500,000 are expected to visit for the Games.

“It’s a great opportunity for Brazil to host and show the world that we’re a nice country,” Nagamura said. “In general, it’s great opportunity to the people who know Brazil and know there’s a lot of good things coming from there.”

The athletes have their fingers crossed.

“I’m pretty excited to watch and see all the sports,” said Orlando, who said he’s most interested in track and field. “It’s very important for Brazil.”

Two years ago, Brazil staged the World Cup without any major operational glitches. The nation’s government had endured criticism leading up to the event over delayed stadiums and protests over spending on sports despite poor public services.

Many of the same criticisms have been present leading up to the Olympics, with a few more thrown in. The World Cup surpassed expectations in organization. Brazilian athletes in Kansas City hope for the same outcome now.

“I’m just hoping we do the right things,” Santos said.

Derrick Johnson's long journey, relentless professionalism, and 'a little craziness'

BY SAM MELLINGER

Kansas City Star

August 27, 2016

Derrick Johnson doesn't need this, these glorified practice plays, the ones that don't count, where his 33-year-old body and surgically repaired Achilles' tendon are out here for reps he's seen thousands of times before and will be meaningful only if he messes up or worse.

But here he is, anyway. This is his job. And he is terrific at his job, in the plays that count, in large part because he's terrific here, in the ones that don't.

"I don't want somebody to turn on the film and say, 'Oh, he got done in on that play, who is that? Derrick Johnson?'" he says. "I have a high standard. My standard is higher than what the coaches expected of me."

The Chiefs beat the Bears 23-7 in a preseason game on Saturday. Mostly, it was not particularly exciting, or interesting, beyond the way that everything involving football is exciting and interesting in America.

Chris Jones was great. Alex Smith, too. Tyreek Hill made a nice play on an underthrown deep pass. All of this will be forgotten soon, the moment something else happens, and with Colin Kaepernick and Tony Romo making headlines, maybe that's already happened.

But if you were interested, Johnson put on something like a tutorial of professionalism in front of a half-full stadium.

"He's a unique character," Chiefs coach Andy Reid says. "You don't come across a lot of guys like that."

The image of crazy professionalism comes early, on the Bears' third play from scrimmage. Jeremy Langford, one of the league's toughest running backs, takes a toss to the left side. Johnson knows it's coming, and zooms past the scrum at the line of scrimmage and inside the lead blocker.

It's a beautiful ballet of speed, power, and brains, and his hands are on Langford 4 yards behind the line of scrimmage, before the back takes a single step upfield. This play is dead. It's all over except the tackle, but then a bizarre thing happens to the Chiefs' all-time leading tackler. Langford's right hand extends into Johnson's face mask, driving the linebacker into the grass. Should have been a loss. Bring on the punt team. Instead, Langford converts the first down.

Johnson has made 990 tackles in his career. He has missed far fewer, but even now, with four Pro Bowls and millions of dollars and respect throughout the industry, one miss in a preseason game gnaws at his soul.

“That pissed me off,” he says. “Agh. As a linebacker, they do a toss play, and the hole opens up, that’s like heaven to me.”

Johnson’s teammates aren’t used to seeing this. A few of them, including Justin March, asked what the heck happened. Johnson, because he’s Johnson, was happy to answer. It was technique, basically. And discipline. He took eight steps toward Langford, but should’ve taken nine or ten. He left his feet too early, basically, diving at a physical player before he had the physical advantage.

But by the time Johnson had that conversation, it already took on a different tone, because two snaps after the whiff he got his revenge. The Bears gave it to Langford again, this time a handoff around the left end.

Johnson used that same blend of speed and brains — at this point in his career, he loses a few pounds each year to maintain his quickness — to beat the center to the point of attack, then weaved behind the pulling guard.

It was 11 steps to Langford, who again stuck his right hand toward Johnson’s face mask, except this time the linebacker stayed up, chopping down the stiff arm and driving five or six more steps into Langford until he was pinned between Johnson and the grass for a 1-yard loss. Johnson got up, screamed, and maybe even smiled back at Langford.

“That’s the pride I have when you strap up,” Johnson says. “Like, ‘Hey, can you beat me? No, you can’t beat me.’ It’s a pride deal. Being competitive. It’s fun, too. When you get beat, it’s not fun.”

Again, this is a preseason game. Against a bad team. At least two of the other three linebackers he was playing with on Saturday will not be on the field when the roster is full. Tamba Hali and Justin Houston, the star edge rushers, are recovering from knee injuries. Eric Berry, the franchise safety, is expected back on Sunday.

Johnson, as much as anyone the Chiefs employ, has nothing left to prove. His place in the franchise’s history, not to mention this particular season, is secure. Nobody would blame him for coasting through a preseason game, especially at his age, and without some of the star players he will depend on when the games matter.

But if anything, Johnson goes the other way. He was the one gathering the defense around him before the game, telling them this would be the last time they’d play much together before the regular season, and that they had yet to be effective. Preseason or not, full roster or not, those are the types of things that have to drive the men who make it this far.

Johnson has needed more of this than most. The Chiefs took him 15th overall in the 2005 draft, so long ago that Dick Vermeil was still the coach and Gunther Cunningham the defensive coordinator. Johnson was supposed to be a star right away, but it didn’t happen like that.

He began as an outside linebacker, and his career probably bottomed out when the Chiefs went 2-14 in 2008 and responded by cutting his playing time the next year. Johnson never complained, at least not to anyone in the building, learning a new position five years into his professional career.

He has made his place on the inside, in a position that modern football is in many ways moving away from. But Johnson has made himself essential to what the Chiefs do, particularly against the run. He is gifted physically, particularly with speed and quickness, but he's football brilliant, knowing exactly where to be and when.

That's how he'll be remembered, too. He has an unrelenting energy and positive spirit. Reid says Johnson practices with the eagerness of a 20-year-old, but he has the mind of an 11-year veteran.

He has always loved football, but football has not always loved him back. He was a top linebacker prospect drafted to a franchise that at the time did not spend much time or energy on defense.

He played a full decade before winning a single playoff game, with two separate 2-14 seasons and subsequent rebuilds in between. His Achilles' tendon ripped, robbing him of essentially an entire season, but he somehow came back even better. Doctors with experience in the procedure say his recovery may be unprecedented in terms of age, position, and effectiveness. He is a maniacal worker, in other words, who could've tapped out of this brutal profession long ago. He is hopelessly committed to the cause, both personal and team, even here in a preseason game many have already forgotten about.

"They say real football players are kind of crazy," Johnson says. "So, I have to have a little craziness."

That's cool and all, but the regular season starts in two weeks. He better save some of this for then.

"I did," he says, smiling. "I've got a lot more."

Chiefs see center Mitch Morse as seasoned beyond his two years

A year ago, Mitch Morse arrived at his first Chiefs training camp and was asked to make the transition from left tackle, where he spent his last season at Missouri, to center.

The transition went so well Morse took over the starting spot and held it throughout most of the season. Now, Morse is seen as seasoned beyond a second-year player by quarterback Alex Smith, who said they work well together.

“I look up to Alex as does this entire offensive line and offensive unit,” Morse said. “He’s an incredible competitor. I was very fortunate to have him as a rookie when I made mistakes or had a question. He was gracious with his time and I will never forget that.

“For me individually this year ... I can’t get destination disease. It’s never acceptable to stay where you are and for me, the great thing is I have so much to improve on.”

Chiefs take care of Eric Fisher, and it's time for him to repay the favor

ESPN
July 30, 2016

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. -- Eric Fisher has yet to play consistently like a No. 1 overall draft pick, as he was for the Kansas City Chiefs in 2013. Even considering he plays a so-called premium position, the left tackle hasn't played well enough to earn a four-year contract extension worth $48 million, including $40 million guaranteed.

But the Chiefs, hours before starting training camp Saturday, gave him an extension. They took a huge leap of faith with Fisher and committed to him as their left tackle for the foreseeable future.

Now it's time for Fisher to become the player the Chiefs envisioned when they drafted him.

The Chiefs have had to wait longer than expected. They knew in taking him No. 1 overall that Fisher would be something of a developmental prospect. He played at Central Michigan, in the Mid-American Conference, so there was going to be a steep learning curve.

Even at that, he has been more of a project than they thought. Fisher was at times so bad as a rookie playing right tackle that he deserved to be benched. He struggled to get strong enough to handle bigger, physical pass-rushers.

Through it all, Fisher showed the gifts that led the Chiefs to draft him. He is a superb athlete for a big man and occasionally made plays that an elite tackle would make. Yet he was always maddeningly inconsistent.

Fisher's 2015 season finished on an upturn, however, and the Chiefs are betting on more improvement to come. He had a strong game against J.J. Watt and the Houston Texans in a playoff game in January.

Still, the Chiefs are paying Fisher in the new contract for what he might do for them, not what he has done. It's a bold statement, and it's time for Fisher to repay the favor.

(Dee Ford)

With injuries to linebackers, it's Dee Ford's time to drive Chiefs' pass rush

Blair Kerkhoff
Kansas City
Star August 3,

ST. JOSEPH - To various degrees, training camp is a proving ground for every player, but no Chief this year has more to prove than outside linebacker Dee Ford.

Ford, a third-year pro and former first-round draft pick, made strides last season, highlighted by a three-sack performance and potentially game-saving pass breakup against the Chargers.

Now, the Chiefs are looking for Ford to take the next step, and he expects the same. Ford is getting reps with starters because Justin Houston and Tamba Hali aren't practicing following offseason knee surgery.

"I see this as an opportunity," Ford said. "The last couple of years I've been working to get to this point. This is a chance for me to step up and really show what I can do."

So far, the results have been positive. In a handful of workouts in pads, Ford has been active and shown his usual first-step burst. Coaches noticed improvement in the spring.

"I thought he had a really good offseason in OTAs," Chiefs defensive coordinator Bob Sutton said. "He showed us some really positive things."

Sutton's praise comes with a caveat.

"I've answered the same way to Dee, it's about being consistent," Sutton said.

That was an issue last season. Yes, Ford recorded the big game against the Chargers. But he appeared in 14 regular-season games with five starts and finished with four sacks and two passes defended.

Ford said he's a smarter player. The work ethic has been there, but when you're not working smart, "it's equivalent to not working at all to me," Ford said. "When you're not working smart, you're putting yourself in a situation for your body to peak out. And that extra burst? You lose it when you over train.

"So it's the same thing as not working to me. You have to be obsessed with improvement, and there's no improvement if you over train."

Ford said he's far from a finished product, and he's a bit of a larcenist when it comes to moves. He's always looking at others who play his position.

“I’m a thief, I steal everything, but I think any great pass rusher is,” Ford said. “Once you study the (opposing) tackle and you want to know what to do that day. You might not to do the same moves the week prior. You want to see what he can’t defend.

Chiefs' Derrick Johnson mentor to young linebacker corps

Matt Derrick
Chiefs Digest
August 16, 2016

ST. JOSEPH, Mo. — After 11 seasons in the NFL and more than a thousand tackles in his career, Kansas City Chiefs linebacker Derrick Johnson still doesn't get tired of teaching the new kids how it's done.

"How do you know that play?" It's always like, 'D.J., why did you move that way?' Well, I'm like, 'I've been playing it for a hundred years now'," Johnson joked after practice Tuesday.

Johnson's leadership has never been more valuable to the Chiefs. With Justin Houston and Tamba Hali still working their way back from injuries, Johnson is the undisputed leader of a linebacking corps loaded with young talent, fresh faces and veterans in new roles.

"Those young guys look up to me so we talk all the time mentally about the game, what plays about to come up, anticipation, trying to make plays," Johnson said. "They make me young. I see them running around, I try to do the same thing. They try to take my mental aspect of the game to help their's."

One of the young players looking to Johnson is Justin March. The second-year linebacker from Akron lined up alongside Johnson with the starting defense on Tuesday as the team searches for the right lineup with incumbent Josh Mauga nursing a groin injury.

"He's used to playing my position, where you can back up and roam a little bit," Johnson said of March. "Now he's playing Mike, which is kind of head on stuff. He's doing pretty good, he's smart."

March impressed last season in training camp as an undrafted college free agent before a knee injury ended his season before it began. He continues to work his way up the depth chart, and Johnson notices.

"Justin's doing well," he said. "He's got a knack for the ball, he's a young that has a nose for the ball."

Defensive coordinator Bob Sutton agreed.

"He's got some of that natural feel for the ball and that's a great trait to have, particularly as an inside player," Sutton said. "You can't tell where the ball is going all the time — whether it's staying inside or bouncing back out. He's always had that sense of nature since he's been here."

"He's got great energy, he plays really hard and he gets his hands on a lot of footballs. If he just keeps coming, he's going to be a real plus for us."

Another young climber is outside linebacker Dadi Nicolas, the sixth-round pick from Virginia Tech. The rookie impressed in his debut against the Seahawks on Saturday, totaling three tackles including two for a loss of yardage to go along with a sack and two quarterback hurries.

“Dadi’s got a motor on him,” Johnson said. “He’s our smallest outside backer, he’s like 230, but he’s a guy that we know has a lot of speed. Young, relentless, guy that’s got a motor. He’s still learning the whole mental aspect of the game but it’s good for him to get some production.”

The best wisdom Johnson shares with March, Nicolas and other young players is the importance of anticipation.

“Certain formations, certain looks that the offense gives you, it’s teed off on what you need to anticipate,” he explained. “To make plays you have to anticipate, because if you don’t you’ll be a step slow every time.”

With the first preseason game out of the way, Johnson said he hopes his youthful teammates also gain an understanding of the urgency to get better before the season begins.

“Preseason is never as good as you think it is and never as bad as you think it is,” Johnson said. “You’ve got to have that mindset to just kind of keep getting better.”

(ALLEN BAILEY)

FROM SAPELO ISLAND TO THE NFL

B.J. Kissel
Chiefs Reporter
August 28, 2016

All along the one paved road that's barely wide enough for a single car, and which winds its way throughout this tiny island, the Spanish moss blankets the towering oak trees that provide shade to most of the uninhabited land underneath.

It could be considered the quintessential portrait of Southern living.

No matter which direction you look, it's like something right out of a book, but here on Sapelo Island - one of the many barrier islands off the coast of Georgia - the 13-mile-long former slave colony is home to less than 50 permanent residents, many of whom are related to their most famous citizen - Kansas City Chiefs defensive lineman Allen Bailey.

The history of Sapelo Island is tangled among the very essence of the country as a whole - going back to the days before the Civil War.

For those who grew up here and call it home - all of whom are descendants of slaves who used to work on the island - the land under their feet is more than just a piece of property. It's a reminder of who they are and where they've come from.

At 6 feet 3 inches tall and almost 300 pounds, Allen grew to have the kind of size you might expect from a kid who grew up on Sapelo hunting wild boar, razorbacks and raccoons, while also clamming and fishing in the narrow, winding creek that snakes its way through the island.

This is life today on Sapelo.

The west side of the island is mostly marshland, stocked full of prime fishing holes, and also the second-oldest brick lighthouse in the country, built back in 1820 and then later renovated. The east side has white sand beaches that stretch as far as the eye can see and rarely have more than a few people on it.

The most famous building on the island is the Reynolds Mansion, which can be rented out by tourists and is where Allen's mother and sister work as cooks to this day. Some of its most notable occupants throughout history are former United States Presidents Herbert Hoover and Calvin Coolidge, along with the famous aviator Charles Lindbergh.

"He talks to us all the time about (his hometown)," fellow Chiefs defensive lineman, Dontari Poe, said of his teammate. "So we know about the whole situation - about how country he is."

Allen is the second youngest of seven children, with three brothers - all of whom are 6 feet 3 or taller, and three sisters, each born a year apart. Together, they grew up running around this giant playground, as they describe their hometown.

Sapelo, or more specifically, Hog Hammock - the small community where most of the permanent residents live - is where Allen was taught the value of hard work by his father, Alfred, who passed away just three years ago this September. It's also where he learned how to be accountable to an entire community.

For some, this is the place Allen developed almost superhuman-like strength.

"Allen is a beast," veteran linebacker Derrick Johnson said of his teammate of five years. "We call him the 'Incredible Hulk.' When you walk up to him, you may think, 'Man, I'm scared of this guy,' because he's pretty yoked up. I mean, he's one of the strongest guys on the team, but he's also one of the nicest.

"He doesn't talk much - he's soft spoken, but when he gets on the field, he makes a lot of noise."

That combination of size and strength developed over time for Allen, and the force he displays on the field has been praised by some of the best in the game.

After the Week 6 matchup against the Minnesota Vikings last year, Adrian Peterson, the All-Pro running back who was held to just 60 yards on 26 carries that day, said, "I'll tell you this, No. 97 (Bailey) grabbed me one time and swung me down.

"I was able to feel the force that he had - that guy is extremely strong."

Allen was a part of a defensive front that held Peterson to one of the lowest outputs of what could be a Hall of Fame career for the Vikings star running back when it's all said and done. Allen had 8 tackles, 3 of which resulted in a loss on the play, 3 quarterback hits and a sack.

He was dominant that day, but the imposing nature of Allen didn't reveal itself immediately when he first started playing the game.

"Allen was always clumsy," Mary Bailey, Allen's mother, explained of him as a kid. "He would fall down a lot and the kids would laugh at him - his sisters would laugh at him. That was the funniest thing about him growing up being clumsy, because he's playing professional football now."

The nickname he was given at school, obviously, didn't follow him for long either.

"He was called Cupcake in high school because he didn't hit hard enough," Mary explained. "He used to hit too soft, so they called him Cupcake."

If his mother hadn't have said it herself, there would be no reason to believe this could be true, and as Peterson can attest, it's fair to assume nobody is still calling him this today.

There was nothing soft about the way Allen and his siblings grew up.

While some cows, chickens and a few other animals are bred on the island, most of the other meats they eat are hunted.

"Everything was kind of free range," Allen explained. "A raccoon, you either go hunt them, or you set a trap for them. Wild hogs, you set a trap too."

Whether it was possum, squirrel or rabbit, the Bailey family and everyone who lives on Sapelo Island learned to fend for themselves.

"He knows how to get his hands muddy and how to take care of himself," Cornelia Bailey, Allen's great aunt and the island's historian, explained. "They say, 'Give a man a fish and he'll feed himself for a day, but teach a man to fish and he can feed himself for a lifetime.'"

"That's the kind of atmosphere he was brought up in."

Allen explained how there was always a spotter and a shooter whenever they'd go hunting, and the best time to hunt was at night with the spotter holding a flashlight.

They'd see the reflection of eyes in the darkness and that's how they'd find their prey.

"My sister can't shoot for nothing, but she can find a raccoon," Allen added with a laugh.

The family knows how to take care of itself. Its members do not depend on the luxuries and comforts of the mainland, as they only rely on one another.

"We grow our own garden, do our own fishing, clamming, and we all taught them all how to do that," Mary explained of raising seven children on Sapelo. "After that we didn't have to go to town so much and buy food. They'd help each other and they'd watch out for each other."

This garden, which is just out of the reach of shade provided by the grapefruit tree that sits outside of Mary's house, died this year because of the excessive heat.

Temperatures can get up into the upper 90s and even the 100s on the island, and they can get as low as the 20s during the winter. While it never snows there, it's common to find frost on the grass during the cold winter mornings.

The lessons learned from this island way of life are passed along.

"I've seen a show on it, on the history channel," head coach Andy Reid explained of Allen's hometown. "[Allen] told me not to eat the raccoons or the possums here (in Kansas City) - the ones I see coming to work, because they eat garbage.

"The ones he's eating aren't doing that. He says they taste better."

The only way to visit the island is by ferry, which leaves the mainland dock that's located in Darien, Georgia, each morning around 8:30 a.m., and then returns at 5:00 p.m., and runs through any kind of weather.

All visitors to the island must either come over on an official tour, or they must be approved by a resident of the island.

The one school on the island closed back in 1978, so kids take the ferry to the mainland each morning, and when they arrive at the dock, there's a bus waiting to take them to school.

The whole trip - through the calm, steady water of the marshland that separates the two pieces of land - takes more than an hour altogether by the time the kids arrive at school.

Allen lost count trying to figure out how many times he's made that trek across the water in his life to go to school, but recalled there were about 20 other kids who made that trip with him every day when he was younger.

School days begin early in the morning for kids on Sapelo, baths were taken the night before and there was no such thing as running late for school. The ferry did not wait.

Allen's father, Alfred, worked the ferry for 33 years before retiring in 2010.

"He was always working hard towards something," Allen explained of what he learned from his father. "Good and bad, just take it and roll with it and make the most of everything. Be respectful to everybody you meet.

"He just taught me the drive, the work ethic."

This way of life is one that many couldn't comprehend unless they experience it for themselves.

There are no grocery stores, hospitals or police stations.

In case of an emergency, a helicopter can be called, but for the most part - they all just rely on each other, even for problems that may arise.

"We police ourselves - ain't none of that necessary," Allen explained. "Everybody has known each other since they were little."

There's no cell service but for a couple of spotty areas on the Western side of the island that faces the mainland.

There are cars on the island that are brought over via a barge that comes just a few times per month, and gas can be purchased from the island's station, which is unmanned and works by credit card only.

There's a limited amount of gas that's available, and once the tank is empty, everyone has to wait until the barge returns and the tank can be filled up again to get more.

They have their own way of doing things.

"It's a little quiet," Allen explained. "The town goes a little bit slower over here."

With seven kids sharing rooms in a small home on this tiny island, the majority of time for the Bailey kids growing up was spent outside.

"We'd just run around the island - walk around and make up games," Allen explained. "Anything you could possibly do. Think about it - who wants seven kids in the house at one time?"

"You wouldn't have a house no more. They made us go outside."

The entire island was their playground.

Allen and his brothers and sisters could walk to the beach, explore the island for wildlife by going hunting, fishing or clamming, or they could swing by the "gator pond," which always had at least a couple of alligators swimming slowly through the murky water.

"They have a certain amount of freedom that kids on the mainland just don't have," Cornelia explained. "So that alone makes them wiser and gives them strength."

If any of the kids did something wrong, they were all punished. It's how they stayed accountable to one another, but that was never an issue for Allen.

The player now known as "The Hulk" by his teammates was given another nickname by his great aunt not just because of his inconspicuous mannerisms, but his obvious size and ability as a teenager.

"If there was a Superman on Sapelo, that would have been Allen, a mild-mannered Clark Kent," Cornelia proclaimed. "The rest of the kids got into trouble, but not Allen."

"He was just a nice young man."

Allen was always one of the bigger kids around, but he didn't start playing football until the seventh grade.

"He wouldn't do anything," Mary explained of Allen as a kid. "He wouldn't play anything. I talked to him one day and asked him if he wanted to play sports, and he tried out for football and loved it."

Allen recalled what first got him interested in the sport.

"I wanted to play football because my brother was playing," Allen explained. "He was in 11th grade when I started. I would go to practice and I'd wait for him to get done."

"He played defensive end and running back."

Allen eventually developed into a standout football player at McIntosh County Academy, which sits just a few miles from the dock in Darien. He became one of the most sought-after high school football recruits in the country back in 2006, ranking as the No. 20 overall player in the country by Scout.com.

Allen had to find somewhere to stay on the mainland during the week because practices weren't over by that time the ferry would leave each night.

"I started staying (on the mainland) in seventh grade," Allen explained. "I stayed with my auntie (at first). In high school, I was staying with one of my best friends, and I stayed there for three years."

Allen chose to attend the University of Miami on a football scholarship. He wanted to get away from Georgia but not be so far that he couldn't easily come back home, and Miami was the perfect choice. He had liked the school since he was a kid and they were a little less than six hours away.

"People ask me all the time if it was a culture shock," Allen explained of moving to Miami. "For me, not so much just because I was back and forth from the mainland (in high school), so I'm used to having people around.

"People are generally nicer [on Sapelo], and just in South Georgia period, but to go to Miami where everybody is kind of in a rush to go here and there, that and there, it was different."

Allen became a two-time All-ACC defensive lineman at Miami, and over a four-year career appeared in 50 games, which ranks as the third-most in school history.

He was selected by the Chiefs in the third round (No. 86 overall) of the 2011 NFL Draft, and it took a while for him to explain to his teammates about his hometown.

"I had to use Google maps to show them exactly what I was talking about because they didn't think Georgia had islands," Allen recalled. "I had to show them more than just tell them."

Allen's breakout season for the Chiefs came in 2014, where after three seasons of working as a situational pass-rushing defensive tackle, Allen had made a concerted effort to become a three-down player, which meant changing his body.

He used the work ethic he learned from his father to do just that, gaining good weight and becoming a more complete player, and he nearly doubled his stats in 2014 compared with first three years of his career.

All the work he put in paid off, and Allen earned a multi-year extension from the Chiefs in November of 2014, just barely a year after his father had passed away.

"If his father were here, he would be proud of him," Mary explained. "I know he misses his father a lot, like I miss him."

Mary won't ever leave Sapelo, and she wouldn't accept leaving her house when Allen offered to get her a new one, so he remodeled her current home instead.

It's not a fast or easy process when making renovations to a house on Sapelo Island. All of the wood and materials must come over via a barge, which can take a few weeks, as they only come a few times per month.

"I added like two rooms to the end of the house and I made everything look bigger - a little more spacious for when everybody comes home for holidays and stuff," Allen explained. "We've got more room to move around and be comfortable now."

Allen's other splurge after signing that deal was the purchase of two Polaris off-road vehicles, which he and his family can be seen driving anywhere and everywhere around Sapelo.

"They're perfectly made for over here," he laughed.

Other than that, there's hardly any proof of Bailey's professional success in the way he carries himself around the island.

carries with him from being a child of Sapelo Island, but much like anything else in life, things are changing for those living on the island today.

"It's changing because a lot of people who weren't born here are buying property and building houses," Cornelia explained.

While land that has beach access and a remote feel to it definitely piques the interest of outsiders looking to make a buck - renting for vacation purposes - there's a depth to the people of this land that stretches back more than two centuries, to before the Civil War.

They are called "Saltwater Geechees," which is the name derived from slaves brought over in the late 1700s and early 1800s from West Africa, specifically the Sierra Leone and Liberia areas.

That's the lineage of the Bailey family.

It's who they are. It's the cultural heritage that Allen's aunt, Cornelia, has dedicated her life to preserving. She grew up on Sapelo Island and literally wrote the book, "God, Dr. Buzzard, and the Bolito Man," on its history.

"I can directly trace my great-great-great grandfather, Bilali Muhammed (to Sapelo)," she explained. "So it's like, the beginning of written knowledge of us being here."

The family has been on this island and in this small community, ever since.

The old chocolate, cotton and sugarcane plantations on the west side of the island, which still include the houses made of tabby - crushed oyster shells, sand, ash and water - is where the slaves once lived and are still partially intact to this day.

"You need something to hold on to that is yours," Cornelia explained. "This is it. America is a country that used to be - grandmamma was right around the corner - now grandma is 3,000 miles away.

"So here on Sapelo, we have this sense of family."

There's a pride emanating from the people of this island about what it means to them.

"Even if [Allen] doesn't realize it at his young age now, it's really going to sink in on him what it really meant to him to carry the weight of Sapelo on his back," Cornelia explained. "I think it's going to mean a lot to him."

For now, Allen enjoys the laidback atmosphere of the island.

"This is a place you can listen to the birds and bees and not worry about a whole lot," Cornelia added.

"I think he loves to come back home and relax," Mary explained. "He enjoys himself when he comes home. He goes riding his little sand dune things or whatever. He doesn't like to be disturbed by people. He'll just stay around the house."

One of the most prized possessions at Mary's house is a gift Allen got her after he graduated from Miami.

When a friend of Allen's, who was an artist, asked him what he might want to be painted, Allen chose to have the picture of him and his parents at his graduation ceremony.

The painting means everything to his mom, who has it hanging above the couch in her living room.

"She cried more at my college graduation than she did when I got drafted," Allen explained. "It has always been school for them. Any time I would come home from break when I was in college - that was the main thing.

"My mother wasn't really worried about football."

Allen thinks about his father - the one who instilled that drive and work ethic that's brought him all the way to the NFL - often.

On game day, Allen has a ritual he goes through to honor and remember his father.

"As soon as the national anthem starts, that's when I have a little talk with him before every game," he explained.

"It will be three years in September," Mary noted of the anniversary. "If you're sticking together like family, you'll make it through. You'll be strong.

"If you've got a family bond, you're okay."

That's how it's always been, and how it will continue to be, for those on Sapelo Island.

A Tale of Two Passions: The Life of Chiefs Guard Laurent Duvernay-Tardif

Hip-hop music blares on a team charter plane as 52 very large grown men celebrate and dance without restraint.

After dropping five of their first six games to start the NFL season, the Kansas City Chiefs have won their second game in a row in dominating fashion—a 35-point victory in London, England, on United States national television.

A nine-hour flight to Kansas City provides the perfect excuse to let loose, and to only top their feeling of jubilation, it is officially the bye week. They won't be reporting to practice the next seven days.

Surrounded by upright, smiling, energetic players, one player stays seated, noticeably closed to this world of triumph.

It is the Canadian-born Laurent Duvernay-Tardif. He is wearing headphones and is engrossed in a textbook. His American teammates call him "Larry," a nickname much easier to pronounce than the French-based alternative.

"There's Larry, looking like hell on Earth," a teammate, Mitch Morse, laughed as he recalled the scene. "He is just miserable. He just played a game. He's out of fluids, and the guy is just reading this book about the same size as his head."

Morse is joking, of course, but the truth of the matter is that is Larry.

Having to study for the entirety of a nine-hour flight while his fellow teammates celebrate around him is part of the double-life he chose, one in which he continues to pursue a medical degree while simultaneously starting at right guard in the NFL.

Larry didn't sleep on the charter back to Kansas City, and after a 4:00 a.m. Monday morning team meeting, he drove back to the airport to catch a 6:00 a.m. flight.

He was headed back home to Montreal, Quebec, where in two days he would take a surgery exam as part of his medical degree requirements. While some of his teammates were off to a relaxing vacation, Larry would begin his bye week by studying for the next 48 hours straight.

There is nothing about Laurent Duvernay-Tardif that could be considered normal, and that is genuinely the way he likes it. Ask him why he puts himself through the rigor of medical school and the time demands of professional football, and a smile will come to his face.

He is a man with two passions, a man who would not feel complete without both occupations.

There are many players in the National Football League who consider themselves at home on the football field. Larry shares that quality, sure, but put him in a white coat in the middle of the emergency room, and he is just as at peace.

To an onlooker, it may seem odd. How could he possibly do both? How could he possibly be both?

It is not ordinary, but nothing about him is.

Today, Laurent Duvernay-Tardif stands at a towering 6 feet 5 and 321 pounds. One of the first things you notice about Larry, besides his overall height and thickness, is the size of his hands. A shake hello with Larry is kind of humbling in a way. This is a human startlingly bigger than most.

Larry grew up on the south shore of Montreal in a small town called Mont-Saint-Hilaire. According to a 2011 Census, the town has a population of a little less than 20,000 people.

When Larry was a child, he was always very curious. That is the one quality that stands out as his father, François, thinks about his son growing up. Although too young to be into that sort of thing, Larry loved taking on "projects," as François describes— any task he could complete.

Larry, who is now 25, grew up the oldest of three siblings—he has two younger sisters—on a vineyard. François originally entered the wine business when his father, Guy Tardif, opened the property after a prestigious career in Canadian politics.

François joked that Larry was perhaps the youngest sales prodigy in all of Canada.

"Laurent, he was able to sell wine at 8 years old and [give wine tastings] to the guests," François said. "He never tasted the wine, but he was good at describing the wine, and sometimes he gave very good tips, which helped sales."

In 1999, François and Larry's mother, Guylaine, decided to leave the vineyard for a year to take Larry and his two sisters on a sailing trip. With only the clothes on their back, the family bought a boat, rented out their home and travelled down to Florida and the Caribbean.

It was on the boat trip where François believes an 8-year-old Larry took a step ahead of his peers as far as self-reliance and belief in the fact that he could do anything.

"We started with a baby of 9 months and the other one at 3 years old (Larry's sisters), so my wife was almost all the time with the babies," François said. "I was sailing the boat with Laurent there most of the time, so he was able to read a map, interpret tide charts and use the radar."

François, Larry and the rest of the family had no major expenses. For a year, they fished for all their food and bought fruits and vegetables in markets off the coast.

The family returned to Mont-Saint-Hilaire in July of 2000.

In Mont-Saint-Hilaire, everything is oriented towards the sport of hockey, so the fact that the city produced a starting right guard in the National Football League is somewhat fascinating in itself.

Larry originally played hockey as a 200-pound defenseman during his early teenage years, but he never seriously committed to the sport as he grew heavier and heavier.

Larry began playing football in Mont-Saint-Hilaire at the age of 14. He said he quickly took to the game because of the balance between strategy and action.

"I think even now, it's still the same thing for me," Larry recently said. "When you're on the field, it's reaction, it's explosion, but at the same time you need to be able to analyze the front that the defense is presenting you and know what to expect. This requires a lot work and film study off the field. You need to be athletic. During your off time, or at night, during the meeting, you really need to be a smart guy to understand football and that's what I noticed about it when I was 14.

"When you watch film, when you watch your opponent, it's really strategic. It's like a chess match. That's what kind of got me into football and that's one of the reasons why I chose this sport over other sports."

Larry played football throughout high school, only breaking for another family sailing trip in 2008. This time around, he was 16 and remembers the trip vividly.

"We left from Montreal and we sailed down to Boston, New York, Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, all the way down to Miami," Larry said. "Then we hit the Gulf Stream and went down to the Bahamas, Turks and Caicos for a year. That was amazing, a really great experience. I think that's one of the reasons why I'm so close to my sisters, my father and my mother."

On the boat, Larry's father taught him science and math, while his mother taught him social sciences and English. There were aspects of the trip that made it difficult, but Larry believes he couldn't replace the lessons it taught him.

"You get to meet a different culture and a different way of living," he said. "The whole speed of life is slower. You don't have a cell phone; you don't have the Internet. It's a great experience and it helped me both in football, but also especially in medicine, because it opened my mind to different cultures and [today] helps me understand and treat people from different backgrounds."

Upon returning in 2008, the Duvernay-Tardif family, now with no vineyard, decided to get into the baking business. Though they seem vastly different, the vineyard and baking businesses share the commonality of fermentation, so the transition was easier than one would expect.

"It's really close because they both work with yeast," Larry explained. "Fermentation in wine uses yeast and fermentation is also used in bread to make the dough. It was not that different and my dad was a specialist in that domain so he just started the bakery when we came back."

They called the bakery, "Le Pain dans les Voiles," which is French for "Bread in the Sails."

Over the years, Larry has actually worked for his parents inside the bakery.

"I like to sell my bread," he said with a laugh. "I just like to be behind the counter, to meet people, serve people. It's kind of a cool shift, when you go to work at like 3 in the morning, the whole city is quiet. You wake up, you go there, you start to make the dough, you start to bake the bread and then slowly customers start to arrive around 6 o'clock. It's just a nice rhythm."

After completing high school in Canada, students are required to attend the "CEGEP." CEGEP stands for "collège d'enseignement général et professionnel," a two-year school that serves as a buffer for Canadian citizens between high school and college.

Because he loved the game of football so much, Larry continued to play during CEGEP.

At the time, with a dream of medical school on the horizon, he figured his years playing in the CEGEP would be his last, as those around him felt there was no possible way he could do both.

"Everybody was telling me, 'You know what? Laurent, if you want to get into med school, you have to make a choice. You cannot do both at the same time,'" he said, "because both are very demanding."

Based upon his grades and background, Larry was accepted into the medical program at McGill University, one of the most prestigious schools in the country. Some have even nicknamed McGill the "Harvard of Canada."

While the school curriculum itself would be a challenge for Larry, what made things even more difficult was the fact that McGill is an English-speaking school, and he was not fluent at the time.

Considering those steep obstacles ahead, Larry quit the game of football in 2010.

"He decided not to play football and just go to school," Matthieu Quiviger, the O-line coach with the McGill program, said.

But before long, Larry began to have second thoughts. It only took him two Saturdays as a spectator before he realized he had made a grave mistake.

"I was regretting my decision," Larry said. "When you're a football player and you're not on the field on Saturday, it's hard. After two weeks I was just not able to deal with that, and I went to see the coach the Monday after the game and I was like, 'Coach, please give me a chance,' and he agreed. I told him I was a little reluctant because I was not speaking English, and because of med school and everything, and he kind of understood."

Larry joined the McGill Redmen as a defensive lineman for the remainder of the 2010 season, and he geared up for what he knew would be the most difficult year of his life. Now a medical student on the football team, time management would be critical, and he needed to get his English straight.

Sometimes you meet the most important people in your life when you are going through the toughest of times. When Larry could not speak English during that first year, the classes taught solely in the language were a struggle.

Rather than attending them in person, he would watch the classes on a streaming service in a restaurant across the street from his parents' bakery.

And in that restaurant, there was a girl—a pretty brunette named Florence. She was one of the waitresses and an art history student at the University of Quebec.

"His English wasn't on point," she said of the time. "Instead [of going to class], he would come into the restaurant with his French-English pocket dictionary."

Larry attended his first year of classes by Florence's side, and what began as a friendship eventually blossomed into a relationship. Six years later, they are still dating, and it is something that he believes to this day is critical to his success.

"I think it's essential actually," he said. "I don't think I would be here and still doing both if I did not have somebody to talk to and have somebody I can relate to that motivates me to accomplish what I'm trying to accomplish. Even though we are in two very different fields, we are both overachievers and we are striving for greatness. We both know that being at the top of our field is going to require travel and work and study in different places.

"Last year, Florence was working in Italy for one of the biggest art fairs in the world while I was back at McGill during the offseason. Of course, long-distance relationships are hard but I will always push her to try to achieve her goal and she is doing the same for me."

During Larry's past three years with the Chiefs, Florence has been able to visit him in Kansas City, attending Chiefs games at Arrowhead. While in Kansas City, she has also had an opportunity to take in some of the things that pique her own interests.

"I was pleasantly surprised to discover KC over the last two years," she said. "It is a very welcoming city. I'm a big fan of the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art, the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art and the Belger Arts Centre."

Florence said one of her fondest memories with Larry was at the Belger Arts Center. It was there he found out he made the final cut on the Chiefs 2014 roster.

But that may have never happened had she not helped Larry get through his first four years of college, where he had to balance both football and medical school at the same time.

"It was all about time management," Larry said. "That first year, I was kind of learning the process, learning how to study and be efficient. You get to know your habit, what time of the day you're able to perform better in your study, what time of the day you can perform better with your weightlifting and training. That was a bit of a transition for me, but afterwards, you start to get into a rhythm and of course, it's a lot of sacrifice."

In the winter of 2010 after Larry's first season, the McGill football team needed to make some personnel changes in order to fill out both sides of the line.

Hardly anyone realized it at the time, but this moment would be one of the most important in Larry's development and football career.

Quiviger, the team's O-line coach, had been a five-year starter at offensive tackle for McGill from 1990 to 1994. During that span, he earned all-conference honors twice in addition to capturing all-Canadian honors in 1992 and 1994.

"We were lacking some offensive linemen and some big bodies, so they transferred a couple different linemen that winter," Quiviger explained. "At that time, [Larry] had played some offensive line in high school before, but 99 percent of it, he played on the defensive line."

It didn't take long for Quiviger to realize Larry was special.

"It took five seconds," he laughed. "After one practice, I went to the head coach and said, 'If you retransfer that guy to the defensive line, I'm never talking to you again.'"

Quiviger was historically one of the best offensive linemen to ever play at McGill and is a member of its Hall of Fame. That is why his 2010 affirmation mattered more coming from him than it did from most.

"I could just see that he was better than me at everything," he said. "This kid was just faster, stronger, quicker. He understood faster. He had coordination. He had extremely good dexterity in his hips and ankles. Right away, I could see he was going to be very special."

So special, that Quiviger offered Larry something that meant more than anything to him.

"He had a defensive lineman's number. He was wearing 92," Quiviger said. "I said, 'Look. No one is wearing my old number, which is 66.' I said, 'Would you please wear it if you don't mind?'"

Larry wore the number 66 and played at the offensive tackle position for the remainder of his college career.

Throughout his time at medical school and a football player at McGill, Larry was among the best in both realms. At offensive tackle, he quickly became one of the best players on his team, all the while maintaining a perfect 4.0 grade point average in the classroom.

"As smart as you think he is, he's smarter than that," one of his mentors and the research director in the department of emergency medicine at McGill, Dr. J. Scott Delaney, said. "Going to medical school is like learning a lot of new information, but also learning a second language at the same time. Then to pick up as an offensive lineman and the different schemes he was using at the university, I'm sure it took every waking minute and hour that he had during the day."

In order for Larry to manage his obligations, it more or less did. During his first two seasons at McGill, he could attend every practice, but during his third season, which coincided with him beginning to do rotations in the hospital, that had to change.

"That's where it got a little more tricky," he said. "I was basically making sure that during the football season, I was getting rotations close to the stadium in sport medicine and specialties that were a little bit more flexible. I was able to go do my rotation during the day, come back for one or two practices a week, and then study and be there for games."

Sometimes, there were hours of sleep lost to the night.

"It happened multiple times where I was finishing my rotation in medicine and I was going to sleep in the locker room for a couple of hours and I was there still the next day for the morning practice," he said. "The guys were just kicking me in the locker room saying, 'Hey Laurent, come on for the meetings.'"

In 2013, Larry was practicing less and likely sleeping less than every player in the country, yet he still managed to win the J.P. Metras Trophy, the award given to the most outstanding offensive lineman in Canada.

This became Larry's light bulb moment. He knew he was good; that was obvious. But maybe, just maybe, he was NFL good.

"The thing in Canada is that you don't necessarily play against all the teams," he said. "You play mostly against teams in Quebec, which is our province, but you don't play against the teams in the west. So to get that award, I was like, 'OK, I'm not only good in Quebec, I'm also good across Canada,' and it kind of motivated me to train even harder and to approach the fourth year, my last year at McGill, like a challenge and an opportunity to prove myself to everybody and to put good film up there."

Larry called a close friend who he knew he could trust. His name was Sasha Ghavami, who was attending law school at the University of Montreal.

Ghavami received the call in Australia, where he was completing his final semester of law school in a study abroad program.

"[Larry] said, 'A lot of agents have contacted me, but I don't trust them,'" Ghavami explained. "I trust you. I know you know the difference in football, and I know you always wanted to do this, and I feel that with your hunger and with what you want to do, you could help me get to the next level.' He said, 'Quite frankly, I don't know anything about pro football and I need help with this whole thing.'"

Ghavami changed his flight so that he could come home from Australia as quickly as he possibly could.

"He went to do the [agency] classes, and we signed a contract together," Larry said.

Weeks prior to this phone call and contract, Ghavami had already been researching his friend. The 2013 Canadian collegiate all-star game had a combine tied to it, and he had crunched the numbers.

"I compared [Larry's numbers] to some statistics that I had researched on combine numbers from draftees in the NFL, and he was competing with the top end of the prospects," he said. "I was like, 'Wow. Granted, he hasn't played in Division I football, but he's got all of the physical tools to get there."

Larry was projected to be the number one prospect in the 2014 CFL Draft.

Once Ghavami realized the NFL potential, Larry knew he had to alter his medical school program at McGill. There was no way he could train for the NFL Combine and study medicine at the same time.

"What I decided to do was to go see the dean of medicine and I told him, 'Sir, here's my plan. Here's what I want to do: I want to get drafted in the class of 2014. In order for that to happen, I need to potentially train in the states for a couple of months, do a pro day or a combine and have good results. And for that, I need four months off.'"

The dean accepted Larry's plan, and Ghavami connected with an American agent, Chad Speck, the president of the Allegiant Athletic Agency who also represents Chiefs safety Eric Berry. Ghavami was not NFL certified, whereas Speck was, so the two partnered up as a team to represent Larry.

Larry flew down to Tennessee and trained for four months, but he did not get an invite to the NFL Combine. This was a roadblock.

What do you do when you're a Canadian NFL prospect who missed an invite to the Scouting Combine?

For Ghavami and Larry, the answer was to host one of the first ever pro days in the history of Canada.

"It was kind of a gamble," Larry said. "To host that pro day was kind of my only chance to put both CFL scouts and NFL scouts in the same place, at the same time for me to perform my tests."

Nine NFL teams showed up to the pro day—the Bears, the Bills, the Cardinals, the Eagles, the 49ers, the Jets, the Packers, the Raiders and the Kansas City Chiefs.

"It was amazing. To be honest, I didn't know the impact of that until it took place," Ghavami, who organized the event near McGill, said. "You see these NFL personnel people come in one after another, and you're like, 'Wow, they're coming all the way here.'"

"For them to come to us and say this was the best pro day they had ever been to, it's very good. So I was very happy about that."

Larry's numbers at the pro day were among the best of the 2014 draft class.

"Duvernay-Tardif was not at the combine," NFL media analyst Gil Brandt later wrote, "but those numbers were as good as any offensive lineman there, including Taylor Lewan."

"I did well," Larry said. "That gave me a lot of confidence throughout the process."

There is a bit of risk involved with drafting a Canadian prospect to the NFL, the first of which is as rudimentary as the rule differences.

For an offensive lineman in particular, the rules are vastly different. In Canadian football, there is an entire additional yard between the ball and the defensive line. This skews statistics and even film when evaluating for the NFL.

Combine that with the fact that Larry wanted to continue to pursue his medical degree, and no matter his pro-day numbers, this had to alarm some teams.

But not so much the Chiefs.

"When I think you do your research, you want to see, is he mature enough to handle both loads?" Chiefs general manager John Dorsey said. "Is he strong enough mentally to handle both? And I think he can do that. Then you marvel and you watch him grow. You marvel his athleticism and you see his true innate strength, and you go, 'Holy crap, he can do both of them.'

"I think that's a credit to those regional scouts doing their homework and really digging and kind of getting to know him and maybe sitting and taking him out to lunch or dinner and just finding out what makes him tick."

On January 18, 2014, Larry was one of only two players in the Canadian Interuniversity Sport (CIS) to be represented in the East-West Shrine Game held in St. Petersburg, Florida, and his performance there stood out in particular to Dorsey.

"Where it began to finish and flash, you go back to the East-West Game, because he held his own," Dorsey said. "Then you watch him play against junior college teams. What you always saw was the athleticism and the lateral agility and the strength with the hands. Those were the things you saw, and if you could dominate at a lower level, then you have a chance."

Dorsey and the Chiefs felt Larry had "enough of a chance" that they selected him with the 200th overall pick in the sixth round of the 2014 NFL Draft. Five days later, he was selected in the third round of the CFL Draft, his Canadian draft stock having slipped due to his selection in the NFL Draft.

But despite his selection to both leagues, Larry knew where he was headed. He never gave it a second thought.

"My goal was always the NFL because it's the biggest league," he said. "But at the same time, football is my passion, and wherever you get drafted, whatever rank, whatever round, as long as you get drafted to a team, then it's your job to go on the field and prove yourself. So I was not impressed and I was not scared about where I was going to come out, I just wanted to have a team and to be able to prove myself."

On day three of the 2014 NFL Draft, a former Kansas City Chiefs long snapper named J.P. Darche was not watching. He was at one of his sons' baseball games when he picked up his cell phone.

Coach Quiviger, his former teammate at McGill, was on other the line.

"Hey, you won't believe it," Quiviger said. "Larry got drafted to the Chiefs."

Darche grew up in the greater area of Montreal, attended medical school at McGill, played on the football team and was drafted to the CFL in 1999. In 2000, he moved onto the NFL with the Seattle Seahawks, where he would spend the next seven years, before moving onto the Chiefs in 2007.

When his career ended in Kansas City in 2008, he decided to raise his children there, later restarting med school at Kansas University in 2010.

Of the 32 possible locations, Larry, who Darche had met through Quiviger, was heading right for him.

"I guess it was meant to be," Darche later said.

Rather than coming to America with no guidance, Larry was drafted to Kansas City, where Darche took him under his wing in the summer of 2014.

"Shortly after he got here, I invited him over," Darche said. "I had him over to the house for a home-cooked meal, and we kind of got away from the whole football thing. It was cool because we're both French-speaking. We're kind of the same background."

Darche would serve as a mentor for Larry, something he needed especially in 2014, when everything was new and he did not play in a single game for the Chiefs.

For any player, that could be frustrating, but it was that year in which Larry said he learned "everything" about the NFL game.

"I think for me, coming from a small school football-wise in Canada and getting drafted in the NFL, that was a big step and there were a lot of things I had to learn," Larry said. "That first year, for me, was really, really critical. Even though I didn't get to play, I learned the whole playbook. I learned new rules ... You learn how to deal with a real bull rush from a 340-pound defensive lineman. There was really a learning curve for me."

Larry put that year to good use, and then parlayed his knowledge of the playbook with a strong offseason workout regimen.

"I really trained with the mindset that next year is my year," Larry said. "When I presented myself to training camp [in 2015], I was really focusing on that goal to be a starter."

The difference in Larry showed something to head coach Andy Reid, who named him just that to open the 2015 regular season.

"When I played my first snap in Houston in 2015, I was confident," he said. "I felt good about myself. But I realized there were a lot of things that I needed to work on and I was way far from being perfect, but I was feeling good about it."

After just three games, however, Larry was benched.

"I was not playing good football, especially against the Packers," he said. "I really took those three weeks to go back to the basics. Now I knew what it was like to play on the field—let's think about what I can do better. Why am I doing all those drills? And when you get some reps on the field, you can relate it to practice ... I think during those three weeks I really went back to the fundamentals. After that, when I got my other chance, I was a more mature, more confident player."

Larry was reinserted back into the lineup at right guard four weeks later, and he would remain there the rest of the regular season.

The only game he could not play in after that was against the New England Patriots in the Divisional Round after suffering a concussion in the Wild Card Round against the Houston Texans.

"That's something that's difficult with football," he said. "You never know when your last snap is going to be. For me to play that last snap in the second quarter of the Texans game, it kind of left me hungry and I'm really looking forward to 2016."

Larry temporarily switched his focus back to medical school this past offseason.

When NFL players are encouraged to take a break from training right after the season, he began his internal medicine rotations, which can keep students on the medical floor up to 16 straight hours at a time.

He figured the beginning of the offseason was the perfect time for such a schedule because he didn't need to be in the gym as frequently.

His emergency rotations later on in the summer were only eight hours apiece, allowing him to follow the Chiefs training schedule during off hours.

Doing both is "not that hard," so he says. It is the switching of mentalities that is the most difficult.

"You go from really, really high emotional states, like when you're on the field winning, to the week after—you're waking up at 6 in the morning, you're on the floor at 6:45 and you're dealing with all kinds of different medical issues and personalities," he said.

That considered, he managed to seamlessly do both once again this offseason, as he arrived to training camp in St. Joseph the team's starter at right guard and did not miss a beat this preseason.

Dorsey recently weighed in as to how far Larry has come on the football field since his rookie year in 2014.

"I think he's got every combination to succeed in the National Football League," he said. "I think one, he's got toughness. I think his hands are better. I think he is strong. I think he could hold up and lock guys. I think what he's done by playing [in 2015], what gives all rookies fits is that. When stunts begin to flash in front of you, he's actually begun to have more patience and sit in there and he can only get better now."

The precision that made Larry a 4.0 medical student has translated to his play.

No one really knows how far Larry will go in the game of professional football, as in each of his first two seasons, he has only continued to get better and better.

The thing is, though, that this phenomenon is not new. It is a trend that started at McGill and has only continued in Kansas City.

Reid has said a countless number of times that he will always play his team's best five offensive linemen, so when you multiply that across the 32-team league, that makes Larry one of the 160 best players at his position in the entire world.

Many try, but few are able to accomplish it.

"To have the opportunity to play pro sports at the highest level, which is the NFL, is something an incredibly small percentage of people get to do," his mentor, Dr. Delaney, said. "It's a little fraternity and club that he'll always have."

But to Delaney, that pales in comparison to what Larry will truly be remembered for—and that is, in his own words, "touching people and affecting them" in a positive way as a medical doctor.

"I hope [him being a doctor] is, in retrospect, more valuable than his NFL career," he said. "It may or may not be, but I think it will be because it probably will come to define him. He will be the doctor who played in the NFL. At some point, he will not be the NFL guy who is also learning to be a doctor. I see 30 years from now, obviously he'll always be a big guy right? So he'll get people's attention. But the NFL stories will fade a bit.

"Well, you know Dr. Duvernay-Tardif played in the NFL."

"[His patients] won't know him as that. They'll know him as a really good doctor and a really good teacher. Who they'll remember—someone will tell the story of when he played in the NFL—but they'll be more impressed with the person and the physician they're dealing with."

In 2016, Larry will play his third season in the league, and that will follow with four more months of medical school before he will officially be "Dr. Duvernay-Tardif."

And who knows?

Larry is already teasing the idea of putting "Duvernay-Tardif, MD." on the back of his game jersey for 2017.

Alex Smith sheds Captain Checkdown label, becomes Captain Comeback

BY SAM MELLINGER
Kansas City Star
September 11, 2016

The moment that must've seemed impossible during Alex Smith's career, and that certainly appeared impossible on a gorgeous fall afternoon, felt like being sideswiped by a racehorse.

Football careers and reputations are made in these blinks, between all the violence, and when Smith saw the defender play the pitch he tucked and dived for the goal line, a dozen years in the NFL making him well aware that he was now less of a quarterback than a billiards ball. The defensive end trucked him from the side, and two linebackers led their shoulders to his helmet.

The Chiefs quarterback heard "touchdown" over the loudspeakers. He fist-pumped a little. He slapped hands with his teammates. The modern NFL means no celebration is official until further review.

So Smith walked to an open space, watched the replay on the video board (he couldn't tell much) and waited for the official to confirm what everyone left from a sold out crowd hoped to be true — that the quarterback who couldn't come back had just finished the greatest comeback in Chiefs history with a 33-27 overtime win over the Chargers in the season opener at Arrowhead Stadium.

Those first few seconds were chaos, Chiefs players and coaches swarming each other in what must've been at least a half dozen mini mosh pits. Smith, who typically shows all of the emotion of a shoelace, went bonkers. He screamed. He raised his arms. He cursed into the noise. He punched the air, strutting toward the seats, swarmed by photographers, his finest single moment in four years with the Chiefs.

The most anticipated and promising Chiefs season in at least a decade began in as wild, confounding, agonizing and ultimately inspiring way possible. It was, basically, their 2015 season — from 1-5 to a playoff win — played out in game form.

There are any number of ways to quantify how unlikely this all was. The empty seats were a clue, at least one-third of fans leaving sometime between halftime and a rally from 21 points down that took a series of twists you wouldn't believe in a movie. Using Pro Football

Reference's win probability calculator, there was a point in the fourth quarter the Chiefs were less likely to win than the Royals' low point in the 2014 Wild Card Game.

Neither Smith nor the Chiefs, have ever seen anything quite like this. It's the biggest comeback since the franchise was born, and the first time the Chiefs have won with Smith leading a late touchdown drive that broke a tie or erased a deficit.

He is Captain Checkdown, not Captain Comeback, and by now tired "game manager" quips didn't appear out of thin air. Smith is 3-40-1 when his opponent scores 24 or more points, and just for context that win percentage (.069) is around one-third as well as all teams did last year (.211).

Before Sunday, he had won just one of 13 such games with the Chiefs, and fans of a certain intensity will remember the win came when Jamaal Charles essentially turned simple screen passes into unstoppable forces in Oakland three years ago.

Len Dawson, the Hall of Fame quarterback and broadcaster, sat on a chair in the winning locker room. More than 50 years he's been around this game, and he couldn't immediately think of anything like what he'd just seen.

"From their point of view," he said, "it should've been (over)."

This was a grinder's comeback. The Chiefs got some breaks — the Chargers went into a sort of prevent offense, and the officials may have missed a push off by Travis Kelce on a key play in overtime — but they did this as a comeback of a thousand cuts rather than a few enormous blows.

There was no blocked punt, no pick-six, no single dynamic play. Just a stubborn refusal to accept the scoreboard, and perhaps the confidence of pulling off a similarly improbable comeback over the 2015 season's final 10 games.

At halftime, Smith — cliched even in rallying cries — talked about needing to go play by play because there is no such thing as a 17-point play. Mitchell Schwartz, the new right tackle, talked of coming back from 28-3 a few years ago with the Browns — the greatest comeback by a road team in league history. Spencer Ware remembered a wild game in high school, back in Cincinnati.

"We know what's in us," Ware said. "We were down. No energy. Not really any big plays, but we just believed in ourselves. In the system. Believed in the coaches."

We can all remember moments, either from a game we played or one we watched, but those are lifetime memories precisely because they are so rare. What are the chances, when the defense is being torn apart from the middle, and the offense can only move sideways? Asked after the game at what point he believed the Chiefs were going to win, Smith immediately changed the question, and couched it — “not that we were going to win, but I knew we had a shot, twice.” It was that kind of game.

Smith’s long track record aside, maybe these Chiefs were the perfect team to pull this off. What they did last year was remarkable, and must have convinced them on some base level that odds don’t matter. This is also, for the most part, a group that’s been around — and been around together. Andy Reid, for all of the fair criticism he takes, is a damn good coach who’s worked and won more games than all but two other head coaches in the league.

This isn’t a group likely to get flustered, is the point.

“Normal human reaction, I think it probably takes the first score to kind of get the ball rolling and really believe it,” Schwartz said. “But if you’re just out there going through the motions, you’re not going to get that first score anyway.”

The comeback came in relentless swings of the ax — a short touchdown to Tyreek Hill on a wide receiver screen, a beautiful back-shoulder pass from Smith to Jeremy Maclin, another pass to Maclin after an awful punt just after the 2-minute warning, and a suddenly stingy defense holding up enough to make it all matter.

NFL life moves fast. Sometimes brutally so. The euphoria of this win will wear off — the coaches will make sure of that — and reality will set in that just as losing the opener would not have doomed the season, winning the opener crowns nothing.

Smith himself winked at that, breaking off an answer to a softball question to point out how poorly the Chiefs played for the first 2 1/2 quarters. In that way, this may be the perfect sort of outcome — a division win, with enough highlights to validate an offseason of hype to the public and enough problems to keep everyone in the building honest.

“This could be huge for this team,” Dawson said. “I mean, it could be huge.”

When Smith was done with reporters, he began to walk away from the microphone. Someone noticed some swelling on his throwing elbow. Wins don’t come for free. Smith tried to laugh it off, then walked into the hallway, where friends and family screamed and hugged him before he even had both feet through the door.
